NEW ORLEANS MARKETS.

From the N. O. Price Current.

The business of the current week opened on Saturday under the restrictive influence of a heavy north-east rain storm, which partially suspended operations and continued with few interruptions until Sunday night, since which it has been clear and pleasant, with renewed animation in the general market. At the same time prices have ruled more in favor of sellers, Flour, Corn, Oats, Pork and Lard having all sold at advanced figures. There is very little demand for either Sugar or Molasses, but of the former there is a fair supply offering at the ruling rates.

COTTON.—On Saturday outdoor operations were generally suspended by a heavy rain storm, but still a few buyers came forward and took 1650 bales, at figures showing no quotable variation. On Monday the resumption of fine weather elicited a more general inquiry, and the demand being subsequently stimulated by intelligence of a brisker movement at Liverpool, the market assumed a decidedly buoyant character, and 5500 bales changed hands, generally at full prices, and in such instances at an advance of $\frac{1}{8}$ ¢. Yesterday the business exhibited less steadiness, but the depression caused by the tenor of the Liverpool accounts being neutralized by more firmness in Gold and Exchange, the sales summed up 3300 bales, at prices which, upon the whole, require no change in our figures from last week's quotations.

This makes an aggregate for the past three days of 10,550 bales, taken partly for the North, but mostly for foreign export.

The receipts proper since Friday evening comprise 6050 bales, against 6692 during the corresponding period last week, showing a decrease of 640 bales.

The receipts at this port, since the 1st of September, (exclusive of the arrivals from Mobile, Florida and Texas,) are 629,294 bales, against 572,801 bales to same date last year, and the decrease in the receipts at all the ports, up to the latest date, as compared with last year, is 103,189 bales. In the exports from the United States to foreign countries, as compared with the same dates last year, there is a decrease of 64,067 bales to Great Britain, of 33,478 to France, and an increase of 76,618 bales to other foreign ports.

TOBACCO.—The stock is too small to allow of any scope for operations, and the sales since our last review were consequently confined to a few hogheads. Prices are very full, and we continue to quote:

FLOUR.—Superfines and the grades above are scarce and in request, but the grades below are plenty and dull. There were sales on Saturday and Monday of 1500 barrels at $24.50 per bbl. Yesterday holders were asking $25 per bbl, but we did not hear of any sales. It is retailing at $24.75 to $25 per bbl. Arrived during the past three days 2830 bbls. Cleared for Mobile 4 bbls.

Monetary.

Gold has continued quiet, with very little speculative feeling, Gold opening on Saturday at 134 $\frac{1}{2}$ to 135, subsequently showing less firmness, being depressed by the accounts from New York, and closing heavy at 134 $\frac{1}{2}$ to 134 $\frac{3}{4}$, opening on Monday at the previous rates of 134 $\frac{1}{2}$ to 134 $\frac{3}{4}$, and closing quiet at the latter figures, and opening yesterday at 134 $\frac{1}{2}$ to 135 and under the influence of favorable advices from New York closing at 135 $\frac{1}{4}$.

EXCHANGE.—The market for Foreign Exchange has continued inanimate, with only moderate offerings. On Saturday and Monday we noticed sales of \$14,000 bill of lading Sterling at 144 to 144 $\frac{1}{2}$, \$18,000 A1 clear at 143 $\frac{1}{2}$ to 146, and \$5,000 bank at 146 $\frac{1}{2}$ to 146 $\frac{3}{4}$. There has been some conflict in their views between buyers and sellers, which increased the general dullness of the market. Yesterday \$27,000 bill of lading and clear sold at 144 $\frac{1}{2}$ to 145, \$38,000 A1, and first class at 145 to 146 $\frac{1}{2}$, and \$50,000 bank at 146 $\frac{1}{2}$.

Editor Christian Advocate:

DEAR Sir—After the most pleasant passage I ever had at sea, I arrived here safe, accompanied by our mutual friends, Dr. D. W. Foster and Mr. Dudley Adams, who have gone to All Pines, 45 miles south of this, where I am to join them in a few days, and together proceed on quite an extended tour.

Very truly yours,
JAMES M. PUTNAM.

THE BIBLE.

FROM LANGE'S COMMENTARY.

The Bible is the book of life, written for the instruction and edification of all ages and nations. No man who has felt its divine beauty and power, would exchange this one volume for all the literature in the world. Eternity alone can unfold the extent of its influence for good. The Bible, like the person and work of our Saviour, is thean- tropic in its character and aim. The eternal Word of God "was made flesh," and the whole fullness of the Godhead and sinless man- hood were united in one person for- ever. So the Word spoken of God may be said to have become flesh in the Bible. It is therefore all divine, and yet human, from beginning to end. Through the veil of the letter we behold the glory of the eternal truth of God. The divine and human in the Bible sustain a similar relation to each other, as in the person of Christ: they are unmixed, yet inseparably united, and consti- tute one life, which kindles life in the heart of the believer.

Viewed merely as a human and literary production, the Bible is a marvelous book, and without a rival. All the libraries of theology, philosophy, history, antiquities, poetry, law and policy would not furnish material enough for so rich a treasure of the choicest gems of human genius, wisdom and expe- rience. It embraces the works of about forty authors, representing the extremes of society, from the throne of the King to the boat of the fisherman; it was written dur- ing a long period of sixteen cen- turies, on the banks of the Nile, in the desert of Arabia, in the land of promise, in Asia Minor, in classical Greece and in Imperial Rome; it commences with the creation, and ends with the final glorification, after describing all the intervening stages in the Revelation of God and the spiritual development of man; it uses all forms of literary com- position; it rises to the highest heights and descends to the lowest depths of humanity; it measures all tastes and conditions of life; it is acquainted with every grief and every woe; it touches every chord of sympathy; it contains the spiri- tual biography of the human heart; it is suited to every class of society, and it can be read with the same interest and profit by the King and the beggar, by the philosopher and the child; it is as universal as the race, and it reaches beyond the limits of time into the boundless regions of eternity. Even this matchless combination of human excellences points to its divine character and origin, as the absolute perfection of Christ's hu- manity is an evidence of His Di- vinity.

But the Bible is the first and last book of religion. It presents the only true, universal and absolute religion of God, both in its prepara- tory process or growth under the dispensation of the law and the promise, and in its completion under the dispensation of the gos- pel, a religion which is intended ulti- mately to absorb all the other re- ligions of the world. It speaks to us as immortal beings on the high- est, noblest and most important themes which can challenge our attention, and with an authority that is absolutely irresistible and overwhelming. It can instruct, edify, warn, terrify, appease, cheer and encourage as no other book. It seizes man in the hidden depths of his intellectual and moral con- stitution, and goes to the quick of the soul, to that mysterious point where it is connected with the un- seen and with the great Father of spirits. It acts like an all-penetrating and all-transforming leaven upon every faculty of the mind and mo- tion of the heart; it enriches the memory; it elevates the reason; it enlivens the imagination; it directs the judgment; it moves the affec- tions; it controls the passions; it quickens the conscience; it strength- ens the will; it kindles the sacred flame of hope and charity; it puri- fies, ennobles, sanctifies the whole man, and brings him into living union with God. It can not only enlighten, reform and improve, but regenerate and create anew, and create effects which lie far beyond the power of human genius. It has light for the blind, strength for the weak, food for the hungry, drink for the thirsty; it has a counsel in precept or example for every rela- tion in life, a comfort for every sor- row, a balm for every wound. Of all the books in the world, the Bible is the only one of which we never tire, but which we admire and love more and more in proportion as we use it. Like the diamond, it casts its lustre in every direction; like a torch, the more it is shaken the more it shines; like a healing herb, the harder it is pressed the sweeter is its fragrance.

What an unspeakable blessing, that this inexhaustible treasure of Divine truth and comfort is now accessible, without material altera- tion, to almost every nation on earth in its own tongue, and, in Protestant countries, at least, even to the humblest man that can read.

For the N. O. Christian Advocate.

A CLERICAL COLONEL.

The Colonel Chivington named below, is a minister of the M. E. Church. Will the Church deal with him. [ANSWER—Yes. A large meeting of ministers publicly en- dorsed him.—Ed.]

A YOUNG CHEYENNE.—Among the guests at the Lindell Hotel is an Indian boy, five years old, of the Cheyenne tribe, who is one of the few survivors of the "Cibivington Massacre." On the 29th of Novem- ber, 1864, Colonel J. M. Cibivington, commanding a regiment of Colorado cavalry, attacked an encampment of Cheyenne Indians, on Sand creek, and butchered men, women and children, in the most barbarous manner. A few made their escape, and not many of those who were taken prisoners were spared. The bodies of the slain were treated in the most beastly and disgusting manner. The boy now at the Lin- dell is the son of the head-chief, Black Kettle, who was slain in that massacre. He was then an infant, and was taken charge of by a sol- dier, named Lemuel Chambers, who took him to his home in Indiana, and adopted him as his son, giving him the name of Wilson Chambers.

During General Sherman's tour on the plains last summer the Chey- ennes requested him to restore the son of their late chief, and it is by the General's orders that the boy is now on his way to his tribe. The butchery from which this boy providentially escaped was one of the bloodiest and most disgrace- ful in the annals of Indian warfare. The Indians slaughtered were friendly to the whites, and when they saw Chivington's troops ap- proach they hailed them as friends. The whites opened a deadly fire upon the camp. The chief re- strained his men from returning the fire, thinking it was a mistake, and displayed the American flag, with a white flag under it. But the mas- sacre continued until nearly every Indian was slain, and then the vil- lage was destroyed by fire. An eye-witness of the scene says: "After the firing the warriors put the squaws and children together and surrounded them to protect them. I saw five squaws under a bank for shelter. When the troops came up they ran out and showed themselves, to let the soldiers know they were squaws, and begged for mercy, but the soldiers shot them all. I saw one squaw lying on the bank whose leg had been broken by a shell; a soldier came up to her with a drawn sabre; she raised her arm to protect herself, when he struck, breaking her arm. She rolled over and raised her other arm, when he struck, breaking it, and then left her without killing her. There seemed to be an indiscrimi- nate slaughter of men, women and children. There were some thirty or forty squaws collected in a hole for protection; they sent out a little girl about six years old with a white flag on a stick; she had pro- ceeded but a few steps when she was shot and killed. All the squaws in that hole were afterwards killed. Every one I saw dead was scalped. I saw one squaw lying with an unborn child by her side."

From this terrible massacre the infant son of Black Kettle escaped. Although he has been cruelly wronged by the whites, he says he has no desire to return to his kin- dred, but would prefer remaining at the Lindell, where he is quite a pet among the ladies, who keep him supplied with sweetmeats and trinkets, of which he is very fond.—St. Louis Democrat.

TRIAL BY A MILITARY COMMISSION.—From special orders No. 14, head- quarters fifth military district, dated New Orleans, La., April 9th, 1867, we extract the following:

1. A military commission is hereby appointed to meet in this city, at 10 o'clock A. M., on Monday, the 15th inst., or as soon thereafter as practicable, for the trial of Mr.— Walker, and such other persons as may be properly brought before it.

DETAILS OF THE COMMISSION.
1. Brevet Major General A. Beck- with, C. S., U. S. army.
2. Brevet Brigadier General C. G. Sawtelle, Quartermaster, U. S. army.
3. Brevet Colonel M. Maloney, 1st U. S. Infantry.
4. Brevet Colonel A. D. Nelson, 1st U. S. Infantry.
5. Brevet Major M. J. Asch, as- sistant surgeon, U. S. army.
6. Captain I. D. DeRusse, 1st U. S. Infantry.
7. 1st Lieutenant John Hamilton, 1st U. S. Infantry.
Brevet Major Leslie Smith, cap- tain 1st U. S. Infantry, judge advo- cate.

The charge upon which the above is based is that of having killed a negro.

HEADQUARTERS FIFTH MILITARY DIST.,
NEW ORLEANS, April 10, '67.
SPECIAL ORDERS No. 15.
[Extract.]

2. In obedience to the directions contained in the first section of the law of Congress, entitled "an act supplemental to an act entitled 'an act to provide for the more efficient government of the rebel States,'" the registration of the legal voters, according to that law in the parish of Orleans, will be commenced on the 15th inst., and must be com- pleted by the 15th of May.

The four municipal districts of the city of New Orleans, and the parish of Orleans, right bank (Al- giers), will each constitute a regis- tration district. Election precincts will remain as at present constituted.

The following appointments of Boards of Registers is hereby made—to continue in office until further orders, viz:

FIRST DISTRICT.—John A. Roberts, William Baker and W. M. Geddes.
SECOND DISTRICT.—Edward Ames, T. C. Thomas and Michael Vidal.
THIRD DISTRICT.—Chas. F. Berens, John McWhirter and H. Stiles.
FOURTH DISTRICT.—John L. Davis, Henry Bense, Jr., and Edmund Flood.

ORLEANS PARISH—Right Bank.—W. H. Seymour, Thomas Kenefee and George Herbert.

Each member of the Board of Registers, before commencing his duties, will file in the office of the Assistant Inspector General at these headquarters, the oath required in the sixth section of the act referred to, and be governed in the execution of his duty by the provisions of the first section of that act—faithfully administering the oath therein pre- scribed to each person registered.

Boards of Registers will immedi- ately select suitable officers within their respective districts, having reference to convenience and facility of registration, and will enter upon their duties on the day designated. Each Board will be entitled to two clerks. Office hours for registration will be from 8 o'clock till 12 A. M., and from 4 till 7 P. M.

When elections are ordered, the Board of Registers for each district will designate the number of polls, and the places where they shall be opened in the election precincts within the district—appoint the commissioners and other officers necessary for properly conducting the elections, and will superintend the same.

They will also receive from the commissioners of elections of the different precincts the result of the vote, consolidate the same and forward it to the Commanding General.

Registers and all officers con- nected with elections will be held to a rigid accountability, and will be subject to trial by Military Com- mission for fraud, or unlawful, or improper conduct in the perfor- mance of their duties. Their rate of compensation and manner of pay- ment will be in accordance with the provision of sections 6 and 7 of the supplemental act.

Brevet Brigadier General J. W. Forsyth, Assistant Inspector Gen- eral of the Fifth Military District, is hereby directed to supervise the Boards of Registration for the parish of Orleans, to listen to and adjust, or refer to this office, all just causes of complaint. He is authorized to employ such experts as may be necessary to detect fraud in registration or elections.

Every male citizen of the United States twenty-one years old and upward, of whatever race, color or previous condition, who has been resident in the State of Louisiana for one year and parish of Orleans for three months previous to the date at which he presents himself for registration, and who has not been disfranchised by act of Con- gress or for felony at common law, shall, after having taken and sub- scribed the oath prescribed in the first section of the act herein re- ferred to, be entitled to be, and shall be, registered as a legal voter in the parish of Orleans and State of Louisiana.

Pending the decision of the At- torney General of the United States on the question as to who are dis- franchised by law, Registers will give the most rigid interpretation to the law, and exclude from regis- tration every person about whose right to vote there may be a doubt. Any person so excluded, who may, under the decision of the Attorney General, be entitled to vote, shall be permitted to register after that decision is received—due notice of which will be given.

By command of Major General P. H. Sheridan.

GEO. L. HARTSUFF,
Assistant Adjutant General.
Official;
GEORGE LEE,
First Lieutenant 21st U. S. Infantry,
Acting Assistant Adjutant Gen- eral.

WORKING THE SALT MINE ON AVERY'S ISLAND.—We learn that the Hon. Charles B. Chouteau, of St. Louis, accompanied by a corps of the "bone and sinew" from the Iron Mountain mines of Missouri, arrived on Avery's Island some ten days since, and have already taken pre- liminary steps to the working of the salt mines thereupon, by the insertion of a regular miner's shaft, some eight feet by twelve, interior, within a larger shaft, constructed a year or more since. This shaft is composed of wood, set in cement, and is made more secure from leak- age by an exterior wall of brick, laid in cement, around which fire clay, from three to five feet in width, is closely packed, causing the entire exclusion of surface or other water.

The great difficulty in working these mines, during the recent war, was want of proper means to ex- clude the water; this difficulty being surmounted by the means, experience and indomitable energy of Mr. Chouteau and his sturdy Englishmen, among whom are some of the choicest blossoms, who stand steady, with picks in hand, to carve their fortunes from the "crystal gem." A perpendicular shaft, of some thirty feet, will constitute the primary excavation, from which arched galleries, widening to some twenty feet, of indefinite length, will radiate, leaving, at proper dis- tances, pillars of salt as supports to the superstructure of salt and soil. With such men as Mr. Chouteau at the head of our enterprises, St. Mary will soon return to her halcyon days of yore.

A vessel has sailed from New London, bound for the coast of Africa on a cod fishing voyage. It is expected that a market will be found for the fish on the coast of Brazil. This is a new venture in fishing.

POLITICAL.

CONNECTICUT ELECTIONS.—The re- sults of the election show that the Democrats have carried the State by a majority of at least six hundred; and likely to be in- creased by returns from towns from which complete returns have not yet been received. This is the first time that the Democrats have carried the State for many years, and yet the victory has been won against great odds and solely by hard work. In addition to the elec- tion of the Democratic candidates for State officers, three Democratic Congressmen have been chosen, and probably a majority in both branches of the State Legislature. The following are the names of the State officers and Congressmen elected:

STATE OFFICERS.—James E. Eng- lish, Governor; Ephraim H. Hyde, Lieutenant Governor; Leverett E. Pease, Secretary of State; Edward S. Mosely, Treasurer; Jesse Olney, Comptroller.

REPRESENTATIVES IN CONGRESS.—1st District, Richard D. Hubbard (Dem.); 2d, Julius Hotchkiss (Dem.); 3d, H. H. Starkweather (Rep.); 4th, William H. Barnum (Dem.).

The Legislature shows a claimed majority of one for the Democrats in the Senate, while the House is Radical by from thirty to forty ma- jority.

Conservative Gains.—Charter Elections.

ROME, N. Y., April 2.—The charter election to-day resulted in the election of the entire Democratic ticket, with a gain of two hundred over last year.

ST. LOUIS, April 2.—John A. Hal- derman, Anti-Radical, was elected Mayor of Leavenworth yesterday. The Hon. Samuel Kemble, was elected Mayor of Lawrence, Kansas. Politics did not enter into the con- test.

CLEVELAND, Ohio, April 2.—At the charter election in this city yester- day the Democrats elected their candidate for mayor, Stephen Buber, by five hundred majority, and gained two members of the city council from wards heretofore overwhelmingly Republican. The Democratic gain over the vote of last fall is about 1,300. This is the first election of a Democratic mayor in six years.

CINCINNATI, April 2.—Full returns from all the wards give Charles F. Wistich, Radical, for mayor, 4,400 majority. The average majority for the whole Radical ticket is about 5,000. For the City Council 5 Democrats and 14 Radicals are elected, showing a gain of one Democratic Councilman. The new Council will stand, 10 Democrats and 25 Radicals.

MADISON, Wis., April 2.—At the charter election to-day the Demo- cratic ticket was elected by two hundred and fifty majority. Hon. A. S. Sanborn was elected mayor.

MILWAUKEE, April 2.—The munici- pal election to-day resulted in the election of the Democratic ticket by 1,000 majority. The Hon. E. O'Neill was elected Mayor.

ST. LOUIS, April 2.—Mr. Davis, Conservative, was elected Mayor of St. Joseph, to-day.

ST. PAUL, Minn., April 2.—The Democratic city ticket was elected to-day by about 1,000 majority.

MORALITY IN ROMISH AND PROTEST- ANT COUNTRIES.—The Rev. M. Hobart Seymour has published a letter, giving the results of an investiga- tion on this subject, forced upon him by an assertion of the superior morality of the Brussels population as compared with that of London. The facts elicited have a most in- structive bearing on the pending Confessional controversy. All the figures have been gathered from official documents of the respective countries which Mr. Seymour names. They are tabulated thus:

ILLEGITIMATES IN ROMAN CATHOLIC.
Brussels—Thirty-five per cent.
Paris—Thirty-three " Munich—Forty-eight " Vienna—Fifty-one "

ILLEGITIMATES IN PROTESTANT.
London—Four per cent.

THE MURDERS IN ROMAN CATHOLIC.
Belgium—Eighteen in the million.
France—Thirty-one " Bavaria—Thirty-two " Austria—Thirty-six " Italy—Fifty-two "

THE MURDERS IN PROTESTANT.
England—Four in the million.

The foreign exports from the port of Philadelphia for the year 1866, was $17,867,716.

LATEST NEWS.

WASHINGTON, April 8.—In the Supreme Court to-day the following allotment of judges was announced: 1st Circuit comprising the States of Maine, New Hampshire and Mas- sachusetts—Clifford. 2d. New York, Vermont and Connecticut—Nelson. 3d. Pennsylvania, New Jersey and Delaware—Grier. 4th. Maryland, Western Virginia and Old Virginia—Chase. 5th. Geo- rgia, Florida, Mississippi, Louisiana and Texas—Wayne. 6th. Ohio, Michigan, Kentucky and Tennessee—Swayne. 7th. Illinois and Wis- consin—Davis. 8th. Minnesota, Iowa, Wisconsin, Kansas and Ar- kansas—Miller. 9th. California and Oregon—Field.

This allotment indicates that the federal courts will hold in the dis- tricts governed by brigadier gen- erals, and that Mr. Davis will have an early hearing, Chief Justice Chase president.

WASHINGTON, April 10.—The com- plaint of Georgia is in print, cover- ing twelve pamphlet pages. It differs from the Mississippi com- plaint in many respects, but chiefly in not making the President a party to the action. The petition asks that Stanton, Grant and Pope be enjoined.

WASHINGTON, April 10.—The Senate rejected ex-Senator Stockton for Minister to Austria.

Morton, Senator from Indiana, will deliver an address to the negroes at their celebration on the 16th inst.

The Russian treaty makes the cession of the Russian American possessions complete and absolute.

On exchange of ratifications all fortifications and military posts are to be immediately delivered up to the United States, the Russian troops to be withdrawn as soon as practicable. The United States pay ten millions two hundred thousand dollars in gold at the U. S. Treasury within ten months after the ex- change of ratifications. The cession is free and unincumbered by any reservation of privileges, franchises, grants or possessions by any com- panies of Russian or other nation- alities, corporate or incorporate, except merely private individual property holders. All rights of dominion pass to the United States. The ratifications will be exchanged at Washington before the 13th of June, or the treaty fails.

The continental domain acquired is about 389,000 square miles. The islands increase the actual domain acquired to 450,000 miles.

Private individual property of civilized inhabitants is to be re- spected. Churches built by the Russian Government will remain the property of the resident mem- bers of the Greek and Oriental Churches.

The civilized inhabitants may remain three years in the Territory without forfeiting their allegiance to Russia. Those choosing to remain permanently and become American citizens, will be protect- ed as such, in liberty and property. The uncivilized tribes are placed on the same footing as the aborig- ines of this country.

WASHINGTON, April 10.—The Dem- ocrats carried Albany, New York, by seventeen hundred, and Lockport by two hundred and seventy ma- jority.

Trenton, New Brunswick, Hobok- en, Hudson City, Harrison and Kearney, in New Jersey, were also carried by the Democrats.

WASHINGTON, April 11.—The President's illness will probably prolong the senatorial session.

Georgia's petition is signed by Black, Brent, Cowan and O'Connor, with the certificate of the governor of Georgia attached. It prays for an injunction against Stanton, Grant and Pope. Proceedings of court to-morrow looked for with in- tense anxiety.

Some New York papers have made arrangements for a verbatim report of the argument.

Georgia's petition read last night by Charles O'Connor who probably wrote it.

STATE MONEY DESTROYED.—Yester- day at noon the State auditor and the treasurer committed to the flames $800,000 of State money that had been received in payment of State dues. This leaves out about $1,200,000, $600,000 of that sum are in the hands of the city, and cannot be regarded as in circulation, or in any way effecting the value of the remaining, $800,000 outstanding, since under the view taken by May- or Henth, these notes are uncon- stitutionally issued, and of course the corporation cannot reissue or offer for sale bills which it holds to be unlawfully uttered.

TO THE FRIENDS OF CHRISTIANITY.

The writer of this was sent by the Montgomery Conference, at its last session, to the Ashville Circuit, St. Clair County, Ala. Soon after he reached his first appointment, he learned that an agent had been sent into that country by the "Northern Methodist Church," with a view of effecting the union of the churches North and South. He proposed to give certain local preachers living there, the handsome sum of $40 per month, if they would take missions. They being lovers, more of money than of God, readily accepted the money proposition, and like ravenous wolves, entered every sheep-fold in the Circuit, and succeeded in getting a goodly number of inferior sheep. In order to accomplish the end they had in view, political harangues were made to the Christian people, and all plans were used by them that they could devise. This was a source of great trouble and vexation to me, for I love the church, if I know my heart. We were of the opinion if it was necessary to reunite the two bodies of Methodists, that it should be done by the Conference, the proper tribunal of our church, and not taken in hand by men of shallow minds and poor understanding, with hearts full of prejudice. We opposed the measure strenuously with gloves off; for we were aware of the many evils consequent upon such an unwise and improper step; the seeds of infidelity and scepticism, hatred and strife would be sown, and the harvest reaped. We were weak in numbers before any members left us; now we are weak indeed. The prospects for doing good are bright. We are anxious to build a new house at Gam Spring, five miles from Ashville; a church well known to some of our preachers. It is now an old dilapidated building, too small to hold the congregation.

I suggested to the members in our first "Regular Church Meeting" held, the propriety and necessity of building a church. All seemed very willing and anxious to do it, and a resolution to that end was passed. It will require at least $300.00 to defray the expenses. They are able, we think, to raise at least $150.00, and would cheerfully give $30.000, was it not owing to the fact that financial affairs are in bad condition. They suffered by the war; made a sorry crop last year; therefore, there may be a good will, but there is no way. Will our preachers and friends of Christianity, give a helping hand in our effort to advance the Redeemer's glorious cause, by each mailing $5.00, and directing to my address. Don't fail to send it, brethren and sisters, for God will return its value to you in due time, if you give cheerfully. Before closing the communication, we would not forget to ask God's people to pray for us, that we may be useful in the ministry, the humble instrument in the hands of God, of winning many souls to Jesus.

Yours in Christ,

R. E. GARY.

BRAZIL.

Mr. Editor: I expect to start for Brazil about the 12th of next month, May, but do not expect to re-leave my family before next Oct. During the time I am absent, I expect to travel extensively in the Empire. Two objects will be kept in view: First, as a preacher, I shall try to find those localities where there is likely to be the largest settlements of American population, and where there is most need of ministerial labor. Second, as an emigrant, I shall use my best judgment in selecting a home for my family. I shall try to find a home where good society shall be combined with a fine climate, and a rich and productive soil.

The months of March, April, and May, will probably carry 2,000 emigrants to Brazil, from the Southern States, and each succeeding month of this year will carry its hundreds; and, but for the strange hostility of the press of this country to emigration from it, they would go by thousands. Why should they not go from the great trouble and unrest of this unfortunate land, when emigration to Brazil is cheaper than to central Texas, and where they will find a soil and climate as fine as any in the world; a wise and stable, and really free and constitutional government, and one of the most hospitable peoples on earth.

If a kind Providence spares my life, I shall write you my views about Brazil, and through your paper answer the inquiries of many friends, who have requested me to write to them.

LETTER FROM BISHOP MARVIN.

Will the preachers bear with me if I offer a few suggestions especially to them?

The power and vitality of the Church depends greatly upon the personal religious character of the preachers. The piety of the lay members will never average above that of the preachers. It may rather be expected to fall somewhat below. It is not by preaching sanctification that we can bring the members to a high spiritual state unless we realize it in our own experience. For if we urge entire consecration, our words will take their meaning in the understanding of the people from the tenor of our lives. A man may insist ever so strenuously upon the necessity of holiness, but if his hearers know him to be proud and vain, and addicted to evil tempers, full of the world and a lover of money, his words will take no deep root in their minds. Their import will be insensibly lowered to his own personal standard.

Besides that, the tone of all a man says comes from himself. How much more the same words convey from the lips of one man from those of another. When Carvosso said, "Have faith in God," there was a power in the words that helped the penitent to believe. From the lips of many they have little or no force. Many a half worldly preacher insists in the pulpit upon these solemn words: "Without holiness no man shall see the Lord." But they take no effect either upon sinners or lukewarm professors. But when Wesley uttered them, they went down into men's souls.

And this is something distinct from mere earnestness either of manner or feeling. There is a species of fervor that comes from a different source. A man warms with his theme in the pulpit, and immediately cools again. His words produce a momentary effect. They touch the sensibilities. But there is a want of solidity and permanence. It is a species of effervescence. Yet sometimes God uses this, no doubt, to awaken sinners. But it rarely produces a high degree of spirituality in the Church—perhaps never. May not the evanescent character of many revivals be traced to this very source? Touching anecdotes arouse the sensibilities where there is no adequate sense of sin. Some, however, go on from this to a genuine repentance and conversion. But many, when the influences of the occasion pass away, remain as they were before, or perhaps become worse.

Sometimes I have been deeply pained to hear preachers say they are under no obligation to be better than other members of the Church. The remark may be true, but it is made for a bad purpose. Men seek to excuse their shortcomings by it. True, every man ought to be as holy as preachers ought to be. But there are some obligations upon preachers to live up to this high standard that do not bear upon others. They are more looked to as examples. Their shortcomings will do more harm than those of other men.

Brethren, preaching faithfully the whole of the saving doctrine will not save our own souls, unless we realize it in our own lives. We may, like the Pharisees, preach the true doctrine and yet live in sin. We may point others the way of life, and ourselves walk in the way of death. In the last day it will not avail us to say we have cast out devils in the name of Christ, and in his name done many wonderful works, if we have been workers of iniquity.

Have we really given up all for Christ? Do we comprehend this matter of consecration? Are we willing to live poor for Christ's sake? Or do we make it a condition of our ministerial work that we must be well housed, well dressed and well fed? Is making sacrifices merely a theme for sermons? Or if we have them to make, do we mouth and grumble about it? Do we not take great delight in dwelling upon our sacrifices, and even exaggerating them? The sacrifice is never complete while we either make it reluctantly or make a merit of it.

Have we faith? When we pray do we really feel that God hears us? Do we preach confidently looking for fruit? Are our sermons, in our own consciousness, mere treatises on religious topics, or are they felt by us to be direct overtures from God, through us, to our hearers? We that teach men to be holy, are we holy? Is Christ our all in all?

May it not be that some of us are going to hell and taking others with us?

THE RITUALISTIC JARGON.

The "Vicar of Bray" in the Church Union moralizes and poetizes after the following fashion:

Now, thought I in my innocence, why not go just one step further and reduce the thing to a certain system. Our brethren in Thibet, so says Prof. Confucius, of the Millinery University (alas! now among the things that were), have praying machines. A wheel is constructed so that the people may attach certain prayers to its spokes, and they are whirled around, many or few times, according to the greatness of one's sins. They go even further. They construct immense wheels turned by machinery—a sort of praying-mill—where the sins of all the people of Thibet are ground out.

Now, as I sat and watched the motions of my people—their wheeling to the right and to the left, according to the ritual; their down-setting and uprising—they seemed to me to be as one, and I the centre or soul. They looked like those moving wax figures in Barnum's Museum, and I seemed to turn the crank. Now, thought I, these people don't love this thing. If they could do it by proxy how much better. So I hit upon the following plan: I caused a system of wires to run from each seat to the chancel of my church, connecting with a galvanic battery placed conveniently behind the screen in one corner of the same. I then persuaded every one of my people who preferred not to attend service, to construct a mannikin, or figure stuffed resembling themselves as nearly as possible under the direction and scientific management of our milliner, in the University. Strange as it may seem, the people, glad to get rid of my ministrations, and upon being assured that it was just as well to have a stuffed figure to go through the forms as it was to pray by book, and moreover, the order would be perfect, all without exception sent their proxy. These proxies my man-milliner placed in rapport with the galvanic battery by means of the aforesaid wires. The old organ was converted into an immense hand-organ, thus getting clear of the greatest affliction of a poor rector's life—a musical committee and a quartette choir of paid singers.

Well, having made all my arrangements, and having invited the Faculty of the Millinery University to inspect, they formed a procession, and with the bishop at the head, marched, heads uncovered, into the church, and inspected the wonderful invention! Confucius declared at once that he had never seen anything so economical in his life. Why, it was superior to all other heathen contrivances, since it would go day and night. The service could be ground out in just one hour and twenty minutes by the clock, and then begin anew. It obviated all keeping of saints' days, for every day, and night, too, was sacred. It abolished all ansterities of Lent; for did not the proxies keep Lent the year round, only stopping long enough to repair machinery? This distress that is now so burdensome, whereby prayers must be said every morning in Trinity, would be all smoothly adjusted. Rectors, assistants, and all, could stay at home and mind their affairs; assured that everything was being ground out at church. And by means of wires and the Atlantic cable every church in the world could be arranged as mine was, and placed in rapport, and then every where could centre at the Vatican at Rome, and the Pope could be mechanically what he is now in desire—controller of the devotions of the whole world.

These eminently wise views of Confucius were seconded by the whole Faculty, and all withdrew in procession, as they came, highly pleased at the contrivance. What was the upshot of this diabolical contrivance you will know in my next.

VICAR OF BRAY.

A Prophecy of Retribution—Gloomy Reflections.

The venerable Nathan Lord, D. D., for a third of a century, President of Dartmouth College, New Hampshire, amid all the political infatuation and religious fanaticism that has surrounded him, and that compelled him finally to surrender the position he had so long adorned, adheres steadfastly to the principles and opinions that he espoused before the insanity that now prevails in this section of the country had become general.

The Charleston Mercury publishes a portion of a private letter written by him last month to one of his former pupils, extracts from which we subjoin:

I do not justify, in point of Christian principle or common prudence, the methods by which you sought redress of the wrongs you have, for more than a generation, received from the North. But I more blame ourselves, first, for our denunciation of slavery itself, in distinction from its abuses, and then by our "irrepressible conflict" with it, undertaken upon false moral and political grounds, and carried on, hatefully, as it has been, after a Mahometan fashion. Were this institution a malum in se, and not sometimes a conservative necessity for all the parties, our method of overcoming it has been, from first to last, unworthy of a Christian people. We have done the work. We have given you a dreadful punishment. But, as we have done it in unrighteousness, our retribution some time, somehow, will come perhaps to a general dissolution.

Yet I dare not speculate about the future. * * I fold my hands and await upon the providence of God. But in the general and in the long run I see no good before us. Judgment will come.

I think thus the rather because I seem to see an approaching catastrophe of all the nations. The world has grown old in transgression. From east to west the experiment of reforming and saving it has been tried in vain. We are the western-most and last; and now that Christianized Anglo-Saxon republicanism has failed, instead of calling on God for help, we are calling upon the negro. We look to a brutified, shiftless and licentious people to aid us in the work of self-government, which has been impossible to ourselves, and which I now believe is impossible on earth.

The demonstration seems now almost complete that man can neither govern nor be governed, nor govern himself, and that the last failure will somehow prove the greatest of all. The volcanic throes of the nations to overturn arbitrary power will be ultimately successful. Then "liberty, equality and fraternity" will have its short day; and when its Babel seems to be completed, the dream of earth will vanish.

Here all such prophesying is in vain. I find myself almost alone. I sometimes imagine that I could do more among your people, and even among the outcast, suffering, perishing negroes, than among the philanthropists who have given them a boon which they know not how to use, and which these boasters never would have given them, but to make them subservient to their fanatical enterprises or their lust of power. But my day is past. What can one at three score and fifteen do but to repose, and to prate and lament?

THE ALBERT NYANZA.

"There is little difficulty in describing the toilette of the natives—that of the men being simplified by the sole covering of the head, the body being entirely nude. It is curious to observe among these wild savages the consummate vanity displayed in their head-dresses. Every tribe has a distinct and unchanging fashion for dressing the hair; and so elaborate is the coiffure that hair-dressing is reduced to a science. European ladies would be startled at the fact, that to perfect the coiffure of a man requires a period of from eight to ten years! However tedious the operation, the result is extraordinary. The Latookas wear most exquisite helmets, all of which are formed of their own hair; and are, of course, fixtures. At first sight it appears incredible, but a minute examination shows the wonderful perseverance of years in producing what must be highly inconvenient. The thick, crisp wool is woven with fine twine, formed from the bark of a tree, until it presents a thick network of felt. As the hair grows through this matted substance it is subjected to the same process, until, in the course of years, a compact substance is formed like a strong felt, about an inch and a half thick, that has been trained into the shape of a helmet. A strong rim, of about two inches deep, is formed by sewing it together with thread; and the front part of the helmet is protected by a piece of polished copper, shaped like the half of a bishop's mitre and about a foot in length, forms the crest. The framework of the helmet being at length completed, it must be perfected by an arrangement of beads, should the owner of the head be sufficiently rich to indulge in the coveted distinction. The beads most in fashion are the red and the blue porcelain, about the size of small peas. These are sewn on the surface of the felt, and so beautifully arranged in sections of blue and red that the entire helmet appears to be formed of beads; and the handsome crest of polished copper, surmounted by ostrich-plumes, gives a most dignified and martial appearance to this elaborate head-dress. No helmet is supposed to be complete without a row of cowrie shells stitched around the rim so as to form a solid edge.

The Latookas have neither bows nor arrows, their weapons consisting of the lance, a powerful iron-headed mace, a long bladed knife or sword, and an ugly iron bracelet, armed with knife blades about four inches long by half an inch broad; the latter is used to strike with if disarmed, and to tear with when wrestling with an enemy. Their shields are either of buffaloes' hide or of giraffes', the latter being highly prized as excessively tough although light, and thus combining the two requisite qualities of a good shield; they are usually about four feet six inches long by two feet wide, and are the largest I have seen. Altogether, everything in Latooka looks like fighting.

Although the men devote so much attention to their head-dress, the women are extremely simple. It is a curious fact, that while the men are remarkably handsome, the women are exceedingly plain;—they are immense creatures, few being under five feet seven inches in height with prodigious limbs. Their superior strength to that of other tribes may be seen in the size of their water jars which are nearly double as large as any I have seen elsewhere, containing about ten gallons; in these they fetch water from the stream about a mile distant from the town. They wear exceedingly long tails, precisely like those of horses, but made of fine twine and rubbed with red ochre and grease. These are very convenient when they creep into their huts on hands and knees. In addition to the tails, they wear a large flap of tanned leather in front. Should I ever visit that country again, I should take a great number of "Freemasons' aprons for the women; these would be highly prized and would create a furor. The only really pretty women that I saw in Latooka were Bokke, the wife of the chief, and her daughter; they were fa-similes of each other, the latter having the advantage of being the second edition. Both women and men were extremely eager for beads of all kinds, the most valuable being the red and blue porcelain for helmets, and the large opalescent beads the size of a child's marble.

The day after my arrival in Latooka I was accommodated by the chief with a hut in a neat courtyard beautifully clean and cemented with clay, ashes, and cow-dung. Not patronizing the architectural advantages of a doorway of two feet high, I pitched my large tent in the yard and stowed all my baggage in the hut. All being arranged, I had a large Persian carpet spread upon the ground, and received the chief of Latooka in state. He was introduced by Ibrahim, and I had the advantage of his interpreter. I commenced the conversation by ordering a present to be laid on the carpet of several necklaces of valuable beads, copper bars, and colored cotton handkerchiefs. It was most amusing to witness his delight at a string of fifty little "berrets" (opal beads the size of marbles) which I had brought into the country for the first time, and were accordingly extremely valuable. No sooner had he surveyed them with undisguised delight than he requested me to give him another string of opals for his wife, or she would be in a bad humor; accordingly a present for the lady was added to the already large pile of beads that lay heaped upon the carpet before him. After surveying his treasures with pride, he heaved a deep sigh, and turning to the interpreter he said, "what a row there will be in the family when my other wives see 'Bokke' (his head wife) dressed up 'with this finery. Tell the 'Muttal' that unless he gives necklaces for 'each of my other wives, they will 'fight!' Accordingly I asked him the number of the ladies that made him anxious. He deliberately began to count upon his fingers, and having exhausted the 'digits' of one hand, I compromised immediately, begging him not to go through the whole of his establishment, and presented him with about three pounds of various beads, to be divided among them. He appeared highly delighted, and declared his intention of sending all his wives to pay Mrs. Baker a visit. This was an awful visitation, as each wife would expect a present for herself, and would assuredly have either a child or a friend for whom she would beg an addition. I therefore told him that the heat was so great that we could not bear too many in the tent, but that if Bokke, his favorite, would appear, we should be glad to see her. Accordingly he departed, and shortly we were honored by a visit. Bokke and her daughter were announced, and a prettier pair of savages I never saw. They were very clean;—their hair was worn short, like all the women of the country, and plastered with red ochre and fat, so as to look like vermilion; their faces were slightly tattooed on the cheeks and temples, and they sat down on the many-colored carpet with great surprise, and stared at the first white man and woman they had ever seen. We gave them both a number of necklaces of red and blue beads, and I secured her portrait in my sketch book, obtaining a very correct likeness. She told us that Mohammed Her's mon were very bad people; that they had buried and plundered one of her villages; and that one of the Latookas who had been wounded in the fight by a bullet had just died, and they were to dance for him to-morrow, if we would like to attend. She asked many questions; how many wives had I? and was astonished to hear that I was contented with one. This seemed to amuse her immensely, and she laughed heartily with her daughter at the idea. She said that my wife would be much improved if she would extract her four front teeth from the lower jaw, and wear the red ointment on her hair, according to the fashion of the country; she also proposed that she should pierce her under lip, and wear the long pointed polished crystal, about the size of a drawing pencil, that is the "thing" in the Latooka country. No woman among the tribe who has any pretension to be a "swell" would be without this highly prized ornament, and one of my thermometers having come to an end I broke the tube in three pieces, and they were considered as presents of the highest value, to be worn through the perforated under lip. Least the piece should slip through the hole in the lip, a kind of rivet is formed by twine bound round the inner extremity, and this protruding into the space left by the extraction of the four front teeth of the lower jaw, catches the tongue to act upon the extremity, which gives it a wriggling motion, indescribably ludicrous during conversation.

I cannot understand for what reason all the White Nile tribes extract the four front teeth of the lower jaw. Were the meat of the country tender, the loss of teeth might be a trifle; but I have usually found that even a good set of grinders are sometimes puzzled to go through the operation needful to a Latooka breakfast. It is difficult to explain real beauty; a defect in one country is a desideratum in another; scars upon the face are, in Europe, a blemish; but here and in the Arab countries no beauty can be perfect until the cheeks or temples have been gashed. The Arabs make three gashes upon each cheek, and rub the wounds with salt and a kind of porridge (asida) to produce proud flesh; thus every female slave, captured by the slave-hunters, is marked to prove her identity, and to improve her charms. Each tribe has its peculiar fashion as to the position and form of the cicatrice.

The Latookas gash the temples and cheeks of their women, but do not raise the scar above the surface, as is the custom of the Arabs. Polygamy is, of course, the general custom; the number of a man's wives depending entirely upon his wealth, precisely as would the number of his horses in England. There is no such thing as love in these countries, the feeling is not understood, nor does it exist in the shape in which we understand it. Everything is practical, without a particle of romance. Women are so far appreciated as they are valuable animals. They grind the corn, fetch the water, gather firewood, cement the floors, cook the food, and propagate the race; but they are mere servants, and as such are valuable. The price of a good-looking strong young wife, who could carry a heavy jar of water, would be ten cows; thus a man, rich in cattle would be rich in domestic bliss, as he could command a multiplicity of wives. However delightful may be a family of daughters in England, they nevertheless are costly treasures; but in Latooka, and through-out savage lands, they are exceedingly profitable. The simple rule of proportion will suggest that if one daughter is worth ten cows, ten daughters must be worth a hundred, therefore a large family is the source of wealth; the girls produce the cows, and the boys milk them. All being perfectly naked (I mean the girls and the boys) there is no expense, and the children act as herdsmen to the flocks, as in the patriarchal times. A multiplicity of wives thus increases wealth by the increase of family. I am afraid this practical state of affairs will be a strong barrier to missionary enterprise.

A savage holds to his cows, and his women, but especially to his cows. In a razzia fight he will stand for the sake of his wives, but when he does fight it is to save his cattle.

The French government has decided to raise the pay of all its employees in Paris twenty-five per cent during the exhibition.

THE FISHERMAN'S WIFE.

It was summer time, and the dawning day
Shed bright on the cliffs of our lonely bay;
And my man went out in his boat to sea,
To win the bread for his wife and me.

The day went on—I remember it well—
The room was filled with the salt sea smell;
And the sunlight came, like an angel good,
Through the doors and the windows that open
To the good.

I sang and worked with joy in my heart,
I sang and worked with joy in my heart,
For I held that a wife should do her part
To clean and brighten the house within,
Praying the Lord to keep her from sin.

I had finished, and just sat down to rest,
When I saw a cloud rise up in the west;
And the moon of the sea grew loud on the rocks,
And the gulls flew low in shrieking flocks.

Soon the wind grew loud from the hollow shies,
And I watched the waves with frightened eyes,
As they struggled and sprang at the cloud's
black frown,
And clutching their broad wings swept them
I down.

Then I hurried out to the old pier head,
Through the yard of the church where slept the dead;
And I wished that my man and I had died,
And were quietly sleeping there, side by side.

'Twas an evil wish—I rebuked it, too;
But one heart is weak where there should be two,
And one voice alone grows weak in prayer,
When it misses another so often there.

Well, I watched for hours in that heat and blow
Till all the light from the sky did go;
Then I turned, heart-sick, from the thing of the foam,
And wrestled my way to my vacant home.

There the breath of the storm blew under the door,
And I felt it whisper along the floor;
And the clothes of my man, as they hung on the stair,
Saw as if touched by a spirit hand.

The lights I put in the window small,
And I saw a cloud rise up in the wall;
And I heard, as the whistling storm went by,
Shouts as of souls about to die.

I dropped to the ground with my hands on my face,
For I feared to see some soul in the place;
And I prayed the Lord my soul to keep,
And He heard my prayer, and gave me sleep.

Heapt up at last; 'twas early dawn;
I ran to the door—the storm was gone;
The morning star shone bright o'er the sea,
And my man came home to his house and me.

SPEECH OF THADDEUS STEVENS.

Not having room for the entire speech of Mr. Thaddeus Stevens, of Pennsylvania, made in the House of Representatives yesterday, in support of his confiscation bill, we make extracts enough to show its animus. After some preliminary remarks, he announced his purpose
as follows:

The punishment of traitors has been wholly ignored by a treacherous Executive and by a sluggish Congress. I wish to make an issue before the American people and see whether they will sanction the perfect impunity of a murderous belligerent, and consent that the loyal men of this nation, who have been deprived of their property, shall remain without remuneration, either by the rebel property or the property of the nation.

To this issue I desire to devote
the small remnant of my life.

He thus discourses on the right:
We are treating these belligerents
simply as enemies, and their property as enemies' property now in the possession and power of the conqueror. By the law of nations in its most stringent provision, all the property, liberty and lives of a conquered enemy who has waged an unjust war are at the disposal of the victor. Modern civilization will scarcely justify the exercise of the extreme right. The lives, the liberty, and, in most cases, the real property of the vanquished are left untouched. The property, however, of the vanquished is held in some shape liable to pay the expenses and damages sustained by the injured party. If peace is brought about by treaty, it is usually stipulated that the expenses and damages shall be paid by the defeated belligerent. As such remuneration must be levied as taxes on the subjects, it does subject all their property to this burden. Where there is no government capable of making terms of peace, the law-making power of the conqueror must fix the terms. This gives them sufficient right to take just such property as it may deem proper. Where the subdued belligerent is composed of traitors,
their personal crimes aggravate
their belligerent offence and justify severe treatment, just as a tribe of savages are treated with more rigor than civilized foes.

We might make the property of the enemy pay the $1,000,000,000
which we have expended, as well as the damages inflicted on loyal men by confiscation and invasion,
which might reach $1,000,000,000 more. This bill is merciful, taking less than one-tenth of our just claims.

We could be further justified in inflicting severe penalties upon this whole hostile people as "a fierce and savage people," as an "obstinate enemy," whom it is a duty to tame and punish. Our future safety requires stern justice.

What more "savage or fierce people" than they who deliberately starved to death sixty thousand prisoners of war; who shot or reduced to bondage all captive soldiers of the colored race; who sought to burn our cities through secret agents; who sent infected materials into our most populous

towns to destroy non-combatants, old men, women and children, by the most loathsome and fatal diseases; and who consummated their barbarism by the assassination of the mildest of rulers and the best of men.

If this is not a "fierce and savage enemy," whom we have to reduce to absolute submission and dependence, point me out one to which the language of Vattel will apply. You would do great injustice to those mild savages who owed us no allegiance by pointing to those who perpetrated the massacre of Wyoming; or to the Comanches or the wild Indians of the West, or the fierce tribes of the Orinoco—and yet you seize their lands and expel them from their native country.

We question whether modern literature can furnish a passage
rivaling the following:

Have they not a right to it? I do not speak of their fidelity and services in this bloody war. I put it on the mere score of lawful earnings. They and their ancestors have toiled, not for years but for ages, without one farthing recompense. They have earned for their masters this very land and much more. Will not he who denies them compensation now be accused, for he is an unjust man? Have we not upon this subject the decision recorded of a judge who never erred? Four million Jews were held in bondage in Egypt. Their slavery was mild compared with the slavery inflicted by Christians.
For of all recorded slavery—Pagan,
heathen or Mahometan—Christian slavery has been the most cruel and heartless; and of all Christian slavery, American slavery has been the worst. God, through no pretended, but a true Moses, led them out of bondage, as in our case,
through a Red Sea, at the cost, as in our case, of the first born of every household of the oppressor.
Did he advise them to take no remuneration for their years of labor?
No, He understood too well what was due to justice. He commanded the men and the women to borrow from their confiding neighbors
"jewels of silver and jewels of gold and raiment." They obeyed Him amplly, and spoiled the Egyptians, and went forth full-handed. There was no blasphemer then to question God's decree of confiscation. This doctrine then was not "satanic."
He who questions it now will be a blasphemer whom God will bring to judgment. If we refuse to this down-trodden and oppressed race
the rights which Heaven decreed them, and the remuneration which they have earned through long years of hopeless oppression, how can we hope to escape still further punishment if God is just and omnipotent? It may come in the shape of plagues, or of intestine wars—race against race, the oppressed against the oppressor.
But come it will. Seek not to divert our attention from justice by a puerile cry about fatted calves!

Here is his idea of mercy:

This bill is very merciful toward a cruel, outlawed, belligerent, who,
when their armies were dispersed,
would gladly have compromised if their lives were saved. Those who will be affected by this bill will not exceed seventy thousand out of a population of six million whites, for this is a people of aristocrats and subjects—of a proud nobility and a cringing, poor peasantry. Those seventy thousand persons own about three hundred and ninety million acres of land out of the five hundred millions in the Confederate States. This, together with the town property, can not be worth less than $10,000,000,000. This estimate includes no man's property
who was worth less than $10,000;
nor does it include any personal property, which may perhaps swell
it to $12,000,000,000. The fine proposed would be but one-twentieth of their estates. Were ever such great malefactors so gently dealt with?

On the pardoning power he discusses as follows:

I shall not question that such pardons may be pleaded in bar for any prosecutions for treason, and save the traitors' property from the forfeiture which results from the conviction of that crime. But the act of July 17, 1862, under which these forfeitures arise, has no reference to treason (except the first four sections, under which we do not ask the action of the Executive).
It declares the property of certain belligerents, enemies of the United States, subject to seizure, and orders
it to be appropriated, as enemies'
property, to the service of the United States Government. In perfecting the forfeiture, it does not pretend to prosecute the owners for crime, but treats their property as that of any enemy who was captured
as lawful prize. How can the President by a pardon restore the property thus vested in the United States? Suppose the delinquent were an alien enemy, and as such his land or property was ordered to be seized by act of Congress; could the President dispense with that law by his sovereign power, and arrest the property in its transit to the treasury? The belligerent has been guilty of no crime as belligerent of which the Executive could absolve him. Neither the war making power nor the power to make peace is in the President.

The power to declare war is vested in Congress alone. The power to make peace rests with the President and the Senate. The power to dispose of the property of a conquered people is vested in the sovereign law making power of the nation, which in this Republic is Congress. A King of England once claimed and exercised the right to dispose with an act of Parliament.
But the Parliament vindicated its rights, and by an act declared (1 W. 111) all such charters and pardons void, and that no "dispensation by non obstante of, or to, any statute or any part thereof be allowed." Have we the courage and the virtue of our British ancestors?

But, at the most, the pardons extend to but fourteen thousand, out of seventy thousand wealthy belligerents. While there is not the least pretence in law that the President, by pardon or otherwise, can wrest this property from the Government, yet it is melancholy that the Executive should confederate with traitors, and by his own act
and on his own individual responsibility attempt to take billions out of the treasury of the United States to enrich traitors; to impose burdens on the loyal men who risked life and property to save the nation,
that fawning rebels may live in alliance and glorify him. But even if those now pardoned were beyond our reach, there are still several thousands who are not shielded by these potential charters. That will suffice for the small sum which this bill requires.

CONQUEST—ITS CAUSE AND CURE.

One after another the nationalities
of Europe fall victims to a haughty contempt of material progress. One by one these nations, finding themselves surpassed or even subjugated
by the superior military resources of some power perhaps formerly subordinate to themselves, depose
a dynasty or dismiss a minister,
and acknowledge the errors of their system by reforming them. Peter the Great apprenticed himself to progress. His successors cherish his example, until schools, steam rams and iron clads will enable Russia to maintain herself at home, occupy the Golden Horn and the Yellow Sea, and lay her broad and brawny hand on the Ghautes and the Ganges. Prussia, like France, has graduated in the school of misfortune. The system under which Frederick the Great fought the seven years war was not adequate to cope with that which Napoleon launched upon Europe. The treaty of Tilsit stripped Prussia of half her dominions, and restricted her standing army. She trained her citizens to arms, and redeemed at Waterloo
what she had lost at Jena. Italian nationality had perished with the dry-rot of tradition. The ecclesiastical aristocracy was hostile to all changes in the social or industrial system. But at the same time that Austrian conquest crushed out her political existence, it liberated the spirit of progress. During the interval, when domestic intolerance
was restrained by foreign oppression, Cavour introduced those reforms which educated and armed
the people—removed sectional prejudice by promoting commercial intercourse, and renitented all Italy
on the battle-field of freedom. Austria has in turn fallen under a more progressive power than herself.
Prussia is a land of toleration. She cares no more for a man's creed than she does for the color of his coat,
but if he will not send his child to school, she will send him to prison.
She has abolished those transit taxes which had nearly destroyed
her internal commerce, and now commodities may be sent from Lake Constance to the Niemas without stoppage, and under one uniform toll. Her usurpation of those Holstein-Duchies was intended to secure a port and outlet for her trade. She is now organizing an armed commerce, and may possibly appear as a maritime power in the future.
The recent defeat of Austria, the subjugation and reconstruction of Germany, have all been accomplished by the moral and material improvement and employment of the Prussian people. The professional skill of the Prussian officers,
the discipline of the men, the system of transportation and supply for the armies, the enterprise of adopting a new arm, all mark the power and wisdom of progress. It is to these causes alone we can attribute the success of the Prussian arms. These are but the efferves-cence of that essential strength which exists in her internal wealth and vigorous system. Let no one suppose that the Prussian empire owes its proud position to the dignity of its kings or the duplicity of its ministers. Material power, based on the wealth, numbers and intelligence of the people is the only sceptre which a nation can wield, and it passes to others with the superior acquisition of the only elements of power. We confess that this reference to the example of other nations has been intended for application to our own. The early adoption of this Prussian system by the Northern States gave them immigration and the public lands, lines of canals and railways, schools, workshops, the banks, the shipping and the manufactures, useful in peace or war. The press

at home spread their Northern version of our national quarrel throughout the Union. The financial and commercial influence placed us under a similar disadvantage abroad. We often wonder whether the Southern States will take to themselves the profit of this terrible lesson, as France, Prussia and Italy
have done, and as Austria is doing?
We hope and believe that the same grand truth is penetrating the Southern mind. It no longer yearns for a foreign protectorate. It is fast losing forth in that party diplomacy which assumes to maintain the equilibrium of sections with the balance pole of the political rope-walker. The sole object of the South is no longer office for her politicians, but independent employment for the brave men ruined or disabled in her cause. She does not admire the adoration of the pilgrims at Washington. The Mecca of the South is the tomb of her freedom.

The education and employment of her people, the production, commerce, manufacturing monopoly of her own great staples, and the development of the resources through the enterprise of her own sons, constitute the sole prospect of restored prosperity or position. The Constitution of the Americans is as thoroughly changed as that of the German confederation. The sole rights of the States consist in their power to assert them. Encouraged and instructed by the examples quoted, may we not hope that as conquest has so often compelled the adoption of progress, it may do the same for us; we may copy from other nations the secret of their strength, and thus out of subjugation
may be born independence.—

RUSSIAN AMERICA.

The President communicated to the Senate Saturday, a treaty with Russia, by which that Power surrenders to the United States the sovereignty over all of Russian America and the adjacent islands.

The price paid for this territory is about $7,000,000.

It especially includes the strip,
four hundred miles long, which extends down the coast, thus excluding British America from the Ocean.

The cession excites intense interest.

Influential parties regard it as significant of Russian policy, in view of impending European complications on the Eastern question.

Russia cedes her American territory for the same reasons that induced Napoleon to sell Louisiana.
In the event of a war Russia would probably lose this territory; and by parting with it the Czar secures the friendship of our Government.

The English representative is deeply chagrined, and it is said that Sir Frederick Bruce will telegraph to Earl Derby for instructions to protest against its acceptance by our Government.

This acquisition more than doubles the United States coast on the Pacific, which now extends from Lower California to Behring's Straits, with the exception of the comparatively narrow strip comprising British Columbia.

The territory ceded comprises the whole of the Continent of North America west of longitude 141 degrees. It is bounded by British America and the Pacific and Arctic Oceans. It includes a number of islands, and is of the highest importance as a naval depot, and for strategic purposes. It is a valuable fur country, and includes a vast section of territory, the possession of which will influence in our favor the vast trade of the Pacific.

GEOGRAPHICAL POSITION OF RUSSIAN AMERICA.

Russian America is that portion of the American continent lying north of lat. 54 deg. 40 N, and W. of long. 141 degrees, with the islands adjacent, together with a narrow belt of rocky coast and a number of islands. Its area is 371,- 875 square miles, and its population 10,723 persons, the majority of whom are whites of Russian or Siberian descent. There are also about 50,000 Indians. The islands are very numerous, and many of them inhabited, the principal groups forming the Aleutian Archipelago.
The most important are, Prince of Wales Island, Sitka, Kodiak, Unioak, Nunivak, and St. Lawrence. The peninsula of Alaska extends very far westward. The surface along the coast is mountainous, several of the peaks, some of them volcanic, attaining an altitude of 15,000 to 17,500

feet, and the coast range being generally 10,000 feet high. The interior is little known: there is a range of mountains 200 or 250 miles back from the coast, a continuation of the Sierra Nevada, and a third range extending inward from Cape Lisburn above Behring's Straits. In the south part there are extensive sounds or Trilhs, lying between the islands and the coasts, and navigable for large vessels for a considerable distance in the interior. There are three large rivers flowing into the Kamschatka sea, Behring's Straits, and the Arctic ocean. The soil is sterile and the climate intensely cold, but in the south some of the narrow valleys are productive. The telegraphic operations which have been carried on there for some time were stopped during half the year by the impossibility of ships entering the harbors on account of the ice.—N. Y.

FOREIGN ITEMS.

Prince Christian's mother, the duchess of Schleswick-Holstein, died recently at Primkenau, in Silesia. Her children were all present at her death.

The first ship with the German colors was launched at Lubeck on the day of the opening of the North German parliament. It has been christened the Germania.

Violets and cream is a new dish
in Paris.

The Sebastopol dinner, annually celebrated by those officers who shared in the campaign, has come off at St. Petersburg. Gen. Men-ckoff, who delivered the speech of the evening, remarked among other things, that the events now preparing in the east were a harbinger of the good times coming, in which both Sebastopol and the Black Sea fleet would be reconstructed.

The Home Mission Society is now circulating petitions all over Prussia
for the abolishment of the fashionable gambling halls in Hamburg, West-baden and other renowned places of this kind.

The other day the Emperor of the French descended to the post of troops on guard, situated in the courtyard of the palace, and there, sitting down in the canteen, waited patiently until the cooking of the soldiers' soup was terminated.
His majesty then tasted it, and declaring it to be of good quality,
had it distributed in the usual way to the men. "Now, gentlemen," he said, in taking his departure, "you can partake of it." This kind and simple act of the emperor produced the greatest enthusiasm among the men.—Galignani.

Master builders in New York say that the reported strikes of Mechanics have had the effect of depressing
the various branches of industry,
and that although the men receive nearly twice as much money as in former times, they will not do near so much work in a day. So labor really costs employers twice as much as before the war.

Cousin's advice to a young friend
just beginning life was: "You are young and inexperienced; take my advice; earn money and save it. If you do not, you will prepare for yourself a dishonored old age, and when your hair is gray and your faculties fail, you will have no alternative but a hospital or the Senate!"

SCIENTIFIC.

Seventeen years ago Ebelman perceived that the high and long-continued heat of the porcelain kilns
of Sevres offered probably the necessary condition for the production of natural minerals, and proceeded to make a series of most ingenious and successful experiments with this view. He put together certain portions of alumina, magnesia, and a little coloring of oxide, with a considerable amount of boracic acid,
and exposed the mixture to the long-
acid melted and dissolved the materials, and at length in part evaporated. When the mixture was finally examined, Ebelman found in place of the original substance—
perfect crystals of spinel ruby.
By proceeding on this principle, and varying the materials and solvent,
he succeeded in producing true
rubies and emeralds of perfect form,
which it was impossible to distinguish from the natural ones. Size was the only advantage which the workmanship of nature had over that of art; some of Ebelman's stones, however, had crystalline facets of an eighth of an inch across.
These were the first successes in the artificial producing of minerals,
but more lately many other methods have been discovered, which are of wider and more ready application.
These processes are of the highest interest to the geologist, since they serve to explain the natural formation and occurrence of many minerals.

DEEP MINES OF THE WORLD.—The committee on the great Comstock
adit, in its very interesting report to the Nevada Legislature, states that "this tunnel will demonstrate the continuation of the Comstock lode to a depth of 3,000 feet—a greater depth than has ever yet been reached in any vein of the world." A proper regard for truth will not permit us to allow this doubtless unintentional misstatement to go before our readers uncontradicted.
It is our impression that in Mexico
at least one silver mine has been worked to that depth; and, at Kuttenberg, Bohemia, the Eschschach mine, believed to be the deepest in the world, is no less than 3,173 feet below the surface. That settles the matter at once. But while we are writing on the subject, we may as well mention a few other mines noted for their depth, of which we have recently read viz.:—The Dunkenfield coal mine, Cheshire, England, 2,504 feet deep; another at Peidleton, near Manchester, 2,504
feet; the bore of the Linden, Prussia, salt-works, 2,231 feet; the Tresavean copper mine, England,
2,112 feet; several coal mines at Durham, England, 1,773 feet, and thereabouts; the Valenciana, Mexico, silver mine, 1,686 feet; and the Santa Rosa silver mine in Sinaloa, Mexico, some 1,200 feet. It may,
however, console our Nevada friends to learn that the Eschschach mine is not now accessible, and that unless a deeper one can be found when their great adit is completed, they will justly claim to have attained a greater depth than has been reached on any vein (being worked) in the world.—American Journal of Mining.

To ascertain if arsenic be contained in any metal, alloy, or mineral, reduce the material to be acted upon to a powder; then mix one part of sulphuric acid with six parts of water; and pour the whole into a strong glass bottle, and add a teaspoonful of the powdered material,
then add some fragments of zinc cut quite fine—bits of rolled sheet zinc will do—and a gas will be developed; let the bottle stand until all the atmospheric air is expelled from it by the gas, and then insert a cork
into the bottle, which has a short piece of tobacco pipe or bit of glass
rod inserted into a perforation extending through the cork, apply a flame to the issuing gas as it is emitted at the end of the pipe, and it will burn; hold a white plate over the flame, and if arsenic be present
it will manifest itself in a circular black stain on the white surface of the plate. The zinc used must be pure, for if it contains arsenic it will present the same proof of its presence upon the plate.

M. Freeland, of Bordeaux, France, has invented and patented in that country a floating railway. It is described as likely to be of considerable service in loading and unloading vessels in port, having insufficient quayage accommodations, or where the depth of water
does not permit ships of heavy tonnage to enter, except at high tide.
Such an invention would be of incalculable benefit in this country, if it can be made practicable. We judge it to be nothing more nor less than a number of pontoons floated into position, so as to form a continuous railroad from the vessel to the shore. Rails are laid upon this upon which loaded cars can the more readily pass.

ICE MACHINE.—A simple instrument for making artificial ice is now manufactured in Paris, by which a beautiful cylinder of ice is produced in ten minutes, or a bottle of wine or other article can be reduced to the freezing point of water in the same receptacle. The instrument consists of two metallic cylinders united, one within the other, the space between them being devoted to the freezing mixture, and the interior of the small cylinder, to the water or other article to be cooled.
These being introduced, the cover is put on, and the cylinder is rolled
to and fro on a table by the hand.
The chemicals consisted formerly of one part each of water, sub-carbonate of soda and nitrate of ammonia;
but for the latter a cheaper salt is mentioned is now substituted, and the mixture is put up in quantities sufficient to make seven lbs. of ice (if we reckon correctly from the indirect statement before us) for 50
centimes, or less than one dime.
The instrument costs ten francs. It is called the glacier roulante.—Scientific American.

Among the most recent of the
"fairy gifts of science" is an invention of a Mr. Hyatt, to make trees inhibit color while growing. The results were exhibited lately at the "conferance" of the Cirencester (England) Royal Agricultural College, in the form of beautiful sections and planchettes of wood, stained with various hues. Metallic salts are introduced into the substance of the growing trees, apparently carried up by the sap, and forced into the fiber and cells of the stem.

TO AGENTS.

Our agents will please, whenever practicable, forward money
by draft on Mobile, or New Orleans, payable to our order. We have reason to believe that of all
the monies forwarded to us by mail but a very small amount has failed to reach us: whenever the
letters have been registered.

TO SUBSCRIBERS.

Any person wishing to subscribe
for this paper can do so, by paying
the Methodist preacher in the circuit, and forwarding to us his receipt for three dollars, with the
address of the subscriber upon it,
stating Post office, State, Circuit,
and Conference. The receipt
ought to be taken in duplicate.

TO ADVERTISERS.

This paper has for many years
been well known in this community as the very best advertising
medium by which the business men of the city could bring their
merchandise, trades, professions,
and the like, before country readers. This is easily understood
when it is remembered that the
four hundred preachers who are scattered throughout these States
in the Rio Grand, East Texas,
Louisiana, Mississippi, Montgomery and Alabama Methodist Conferences, are all, more or less
active agents for the paper; and
when it is also remembered that
our paper circulates among a large
class of people who seldom see
any other New Orleans paper.

RITUALISM.

The Ritualists proper take their rise from the period immediately succeeding the publication of the "Tracts for the Times."
They stand relatively to the Tractarians as "meat" to "milk."
They are a body of men, who have discovered that "it is possible to shake off the bondage of Protestantism, and yet to remain in the English Church." On one side of that huge conglomerate we have the "Puritan," the "Broad Church," "the High and Dry," on the other, the smaller and far more vigorous school which pushes on the Catholic Revival. Tractari-anism in its early phases, was a 'religion for gentlemen,' but Ultra-Ritualism assumes to specially address the middle and the poorer classes which have hitherto been approached in a manner which had no effect upon them. It now assumes a democratic aspect; is missionary; anti-pew, industrious and histrionic. It professes by ceremonies 1st. to "imitate on earth actions which are thought to be going on in heaven." 2d. To symbolize invisible powers. 3d.
To indicate that personal action is the soul of public worship. All which they say can be found in the symbolic Sacraments of Baptism,
and the Lord's Supper.

This small but active body of Romanizing Episcopalians have produced a great ferment in the English Establishment. The Houses of Convocation, Court of Archbishops, the Parliament, Archbishops, and Bishops, are solemnly together by the ears discussing the legality of bowings, chantings,
processions, decorations, dalmatiques, chasubles, monacles, varie-gated altar cloths, fixed altars, frontals, super frontals, and other items which make up a shifting scene of debasing superstition and idolatry, and bridge a way from the Protestant Episcopal Church to the Church of Rome. Eminent counsel and skilled lawyers are employed to draw up and give forth elaborate opinions upon the permissible extent, the uses and abuses of phylacteries and ephods.
Large volumes are published upon Church Upholstery—"Ecclesiastical Vestments"—"The Accessories of Divine Service"—"Lawful Church Ornaments"—"The Ornaments of a Minister"—"Disputed Ritual Ornaments"—and other such solemn-toned foolery:—

"The Bishop will enter the Cathedral Church, vested in purple cassock, rochet, chimere, episcopal ring, zucchetto, and biretta.
If he do not rest in the sacristy,
he will receive his vestments from the altar. On reaching the fold-stool, the bishop will remove his biretta, and deliver it to the deacon, who will hand it to the sub-deacon; who in his turn will deliver it to an acolyte. He will wear
the zucchetto till the assumption of the mitre. The gloves will be carried on a salver. The bishop on being vested with the dalmatic, sits down, and the deacon removes the episcopal ring, and hands it to the sub-deacon to place on a salver held by an acolyte for that function. The gloves are then presented on a salver, and should be so arranged that the right may lie
at the side of the deacon, and the left at that of the sub-deacon. In putting on the gloves, the deacon assists at the right, and the sub-deacon at the left." All which we suppose it is possible for men to go through with fatuous solemnity, but is enough to make Satan wink knowingly.

The Directorium Anglicanum
directs that in entering the choir,
the 'epistoler, gospeller and celebrant,' should walk 'with bodies
erect, and eyes turned to the ground,'
—the hands of all the ministers should be joined before the breast with the fingers extended, and the right thumb placed over the left,
in the form of a cross when kneeling. The feet are put close together. In sitting, the legs should not be crossed, and the hands should be placed in the lap." This rabbinical mummery is considered as the 'unstudied out-flow' of a full believer's faith. But to our view, these complicated antics are the legitimate result of departing from the simple forms of the New Testament. If forms were compatible with spiritual life, the inspired pious ritual of the Old Testament would have been retained by the Saviour; the temple itself

would not have been thrown down,
and the Apostles would have come forth from the Aaronic line. But when the veil was rent, and the off of the temple sacrifices was declared to be the extreme type of Him who suffered "without the camp," "once for all," then shadows passed forever away. "We have an altar whereof they have no right to eat which serve the tabernacle." The men who revive or attempt to reproduce forms now dead, however once significant, intelligible and authentic, which have been dismissed and abolished by the Lord of Life, do practically and effectually deny the whole scheme
of a Saviour's grace and wisdom.

They affirm a monstrous concrete scheme of error of their own to be the only Church of Christ:
that all others are but sects and schismatic; that all ministers
but those Episcopally ordained and transmitted are imposters, and not divinely authorized; that salvation is only to be attained in this church and by this ministry. That salvation is dispensed through the Sacrament; and the efficacy of the Sacrament depends upon the authority of the person administering it: that the salvation of the souls of the people is in the hands
of this ministry, and that the gift of the Holy Ghost is conferred by the laying on of the hands of the Bishop in the rite of confirmation.
That the life of the soul is nourished by the body and blood of Christ, dispensed in the Holy Communion, and inseparable from them.
That the actual body and blood of Christ are in the bread and wine of the Sacrament. That they become so under the solemn handling and consecration of the appointed priesthood. That there is no other power to consecrate these elements. And that the spiritual benefit is reaped by partaking of this outward manifestation.

This is the summing up of one of the most distinguished Episcopal Divines of New York, and not merely our own rendering, of the Ritualistic Faith. Mr. Stuart, of St. Magdalene's, London, says, "If the Bishop of London is inclined
'to run-a-muck' at Catholic faith and Catholic worship, by all means let him do so. If he wishes to puritanize the Church, as I believe he does, let him take all lawful means toward his object; and if we wish to Catholicise the Church,
as we avowedly do, let us take all lawful means towards our object
too; and God defend the right!"
After this there can be no mistake
as to what Ritualism is. It is avowedly and truly an attempt to Catholicise the Protestant Episcopal Church.

The antiquated prayer book, and the usual style of service in the Episcopal Church, are deemed by Dr. Littledale to be utterly inadequate for effect:—"There is nothing to impress the eye, nothing to quicken the attention, nothing to make the breath come short or the pulse beat quicker. There is not the sense of awful, brooding calm,
which those who know what a Presbyterian Communion-day in Scotland is, when conducted by ministers of a high stamp, will remember with respect." There is not the swing and heartiness of a Wesleyan meeting. There is not the mysterious and symbolical pomp of a Roman Catholic church." Mr.
Richard Frederick Littledale, M.
A. LL.D., Priest of the Church of England," as he styles himself, makes no calculation upon the presence of the Holy Spirit for convincing the world of sin, righteousness, and judgment, but throws the entire responsibility for saving

men upon the mixed, chance;
the elevation of the Host; the incense; an eastward position of the Priest in front of the altar; from four to eight candles; four pots of flowers; the use of wafer-bread;
the ancient vestments of the clergy;
and a cross—"for behold through its wood joy has come into the world."

So we see what this hollow cere-monialism is, which in the guise of a worshipper seeks to overthrow the Church of God. Let all God-fearing people beware "lest by any means, as the Serpent beguiled Eve through his subtlety, so their minds should be corrupted from the simplicity that is in Christ. * *
* for such are false apostles, deceitful workers transforming themselves into the apostles of Christ.
And no marvel for Satan himself is transformed into an angel of light.
Therefore, it is no great thing if his ministers also be transformed as the ministers of righteousness; whose end shall be according to their works."

"My church in town! It fronts our square,
With Gothic portals—Scott designed—
Tall spire, and painted windows rare,
There's nothing in it London finer.
A church that's counted 'very high,'
A ritualist rector owning,
Who makes a claim to Heaven's ray
On crosses, candles, and incense."

And crowds of worshippers come here,
Who give one morning of the seven
To treading with exceeding care
A fashionable road to Heaven—
Fine ladies who low bending pray,
And sigh for services in Latin,
And mortify the flesh each day
In gleaming robes of silk and satin.

The curate, "such a dear," you know,
Airs a white hand to turn his pages;
I hardly think St. Paul did so
When preaching to Athenian sages.
His doctrine, if it has a fault,
Stands much in need of force and flavor,
And makes me think the gospel salt
Has very nearly lost its savor."

Where Dives sits, I look in vain
For Lazarus, even at the portal,
I wonder, does their creed maintain
The rich man only is immortal?
And yet my mind is somewhat eased,
So vain and rapid is the preaching,
That Lazarus hardly would be pleased
To gather fragments of such teaching.

It would be worthier of the times,
And talk of charitable graces,
If we took care the Sunday chimes
Should sometimes sound in silent places.
The brooder's altar-cloth might tell
Of pious hands, and yet be plainer;
A simpler, homelier rite were well,
So should the poor man be a gainer."

WAR IN EUROPE.

The speech of M. Thiers, the celebrated historian, in the French Assembly, came to hand this week in the original. It is eleven columns long and is a masterpiece of arrangement, condensation and argument. The speaker first recites the history of Europe from the earliest ages, and shows that political equilibrium is its natural and necessary
law, to preserve which was the end of all the great wars. It is not an idea, but a living reality, and must be preserved. He shows that this equilibrium is now disturbed. The disturbance originated with the unity of Italy, which necessarily led to the unity of Germany, and he intimates that a great war will grow out of it.—Picayune.

The peace of Europe is maintained by a resolution of forces.
The great Powers must therefore preserve, with vigilance, and by arms if necessary, that relative equality which prevents any one Empire from undue advantage.
France, Prussia, Austria, England,
and Russia, each fears lest there should be a combination of all the others against itself. To these may be now added Italy—Sardinia,
a country which has within ten years been fostered by France into an empire of unity and strength.
While France was taking advantage of the war of the States to occupy and annex Mexico, Prussia seized the occasion to realize her plans of aggrandizement, and succeeded in wresting from Denmark and Germany large portions of territory thickly populated, and in adding them to her own. Her success was so great, and her movements so rapid and powerful, that the other powers did not venture

at the time beyond trying to moderate her demands of Austria. This accomplished, they began to prepare for war, as expeditiously and quietly as possible. The present question is about the Grand Duchy of Luxembourg. The French have arranged to buy it, but Prussia holds its great fortress, and is not disposed to yield so important a country to her rival. When nations are ready for war, and mean war,
there is never any difficulty in springing it. If Prussia and France begin, Russia will seize the occasion to possess herself of Constantinople. But Turkey is the key to the East Indies and England cannot see it pass into the hands of the Great Empire of the North:
an Empire which has already swallowed Northern Asia; which threatens China; and with free access to the Mediterranean, could soon conquer Southern Europe.
Therefore, England in the event of a conflict between France and Prussia, must be drawn in to the aid of France, to maintain her own eastern possessions.

As Prussia can derive but little additional strength from her newly acquired States, but they may be to her a source of weakness, having to watch and occupy them with a part of her troops, France, even if unaided by England, will be able, having a superior navy, to compel the restoration of the provinces wrested by Prussia from Denmark.

SANCTIFICATION OF THE SABBATH.

We are glad to notice that the publishers of the Picayune, the Crescent, the Times, and the Bee, have determined to banish Sunday work
from their offices.

NEW ORLEANS, April 3, 1867.

At a full meeting of the Association of Press of New Orleans, held this day, the following preamble and resolution was adopted:

WHEREAS, The labor, mental and physical, necessary to the production of a Monday morning paper,
must be almost entirely performed
on Sunday, while that for the issue of a Sunday morning edition is, with the exception of delivery, performed on the previous day; and whereas,
the physiological as well as psychological requirements of human nature render one day of rest out of seven particularly desirable, therefore,

Resolved, That in order to afford
all persons connected with our respective offices an opportunity of enjoying such rest, recreation or religious exercises as the conscience of each may respectively approve, we hereby agree to discontinue the Monday morning edition of the journals we severally represent.

TYPE ACCIDENTS.—We must apologize to the author for the degraded setting of that excellent communication in our last issue,
"The History of one Family Altar."

DETENTION.—Last week our paper was thrown back in the mailing, by the delay incident upon preparing a new method.

RECOLLECTIONS OF HENRY WAT-KINS ALLEN, Brigadier-General,
Confederate States Army, Ex-
Governor of Louisiana, by SA-RAH A. DORSEY.
New Orleans, James A. Gresham, 92 Camp street, New Orleans, 1867, 12 mo.

This is an excellent biography:
The writer has rare fitness and opportunity for delineating the character of Governor Allen. We were surprised to find the work so full of general information, abounding in literary and scientific illustrations, and detailing with great minuteness the war history of the prominent points in the South-West. As a book of record, and as a contribution to the History of the recent War of the States, it will be of much value to the future historian. The criticisms upon the campaign and management of affairs in the Trans-Mississippi Department, exhibits much accurate knowledge of its affairs. The war demonstrated Governor Allen to be a man of heroic moral and great administrative power.

His memory will ever be nourished
by the people of Louisiana.

MONTGOMERY CONFERENCE.

DISTRICT MEETINGS.—J W Shore
from special committee on district meetings, made the following report
which was adopted:

WHEREAS, The late Conference
adopted a plan of Lay representation in the Annual and General Conferences, and submitted the same to the several Annual Conferences for ratification or rejection, and in case of ratification, empowered each Annual Conference to devise its own plan for the election of Lay delegates from the several presiding
elders, districts of the same; therefore,

Resolved, That in the contingency named, this business shall be transacted by district meetings, to be constituted as follows:

1st.—A meeting of all the traveling preachers, and four laymen, elected by the Quarterly Conferences of the stations, circuits, and missions
within each presiding elders' district, shall be called annually by the presiding elder thereof, at such time
as he may specify: Provided, That all the official members in the district, may be ex-officio members of the district meeting.

2d.—In the absence of a Bishop,
the presiding elder of the district shall preside in the meeting; and in the absence of both, the meeting shall elect its own President.

3d.—The district meeting shall elect a secretary to keep a record of the proceedings of the body; he shall also be its treasurer.

4th.—The district meeting shall adopt such measures for the advancement of the interests of the church in its bounds, as it may deem best, and as are consistent with the laws of the church. It shall also appoint the place of its own meeting.

5th.—If the plan of Lay representation shall become a law of the church, it shall also be the business of elected delegates of the district meeting, to elect delegates to the Annual Conference.

6th.—The holding of the district
meetings shall not be contingent
upon the final adoption of Lay representation by the Annual Conference.

OBITUARIES.

JOHN PATRICK, the subject of this notice, was born in Tyrone county, Ireland, in the month of February, 1810. Professed religion in the 23rd year of his age, and joined the M. E. Church, of which he was an active and zealous member. He emigrated to America in 1837, stopping first a short time in Charlotte, N. C., and settling in Marion, Ala., in 1838. Immediately upon his arrival he presented his certificate of church membership, and identified himself with the little flock at that place. During his residence in this community, a period of almost thirty years, his deportment was such as becomes the gospel of Christ. He was active as a steward and class-leader,
and though his health was feeble, his devotions were never neglected. Though diligent in business, he was fervent in spirit, serving the Lord. Indeed, it may be truly said, that all he was, and all he had was consecrated to God. The needy never applied to him in vain, but his charities were not ostentatious. His piety was simple, unaffected, and uniform, hence, he was always prepared to give a reason of the hope

A COMPREHENSIVE DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE.

MAINLY ARRIVED FROM

DR. WM. SMITH'S DICTIONARY

OF

THE BIBLE.

WITH Important Additions and Improvements,
AND
FIVE HUNDRED ILLUSTRATIONS

Dr. Smith's Dictionary of the Bible, published in 1860-63, and containing in its three large octavo volumes, nearly 3200 pages, is a work of acknowledged excellence; but its size, cost, and scholarly character, must prevent any extensive circulation of it among the great mass of those who desire and need a Dictionary of the Bible. The "Comprehensive Dictionary," on which nearly two years of editorial labor have already been expended, owes its origin to a settled conviction, on the part of the Editor and Publishers, of the need of such a modified abridgment of the original work as should make the results of modern scholarship generally accessible.

The Editor, Rev. Samuel W. Barnum, M. A., is well known among the graduates of Yale College as an accurate and thorough scholar. His experience in 1845-47, as the principal assistant of the late Prof. Goodrich, in the revision of Webster's Dictionary (unabridged and royal octavo edition), made him familiar with the details of lexicography; and his subsequent labors as an efficient expounder of the Scriptures, gave him a practical acquaintance with the wants of the people in the field of Biblical knowledge.

The General Principles which have guided him in the preparation of the present work have been:
I. To make every thing intelligible to those who understand only English, and to place them as nearly as possible on a level with the scholars who are familiar with the original languages of the Scriptures.
II. To condense the greatest possible amount of valuable information into one volume of convenient size and moderate cost.III. To guard against all influences hostile to Christian faith and love.
The page is somewhat larger than that of Smith's Dictionary, and the type of a heavier face, and more easily read. No pains will be spared to make the mechanical execution accurate and beautiful.

The Dictionary will be issued in semi-monthly numbers of 48 royal octavo pages each. The whole work will probably be contained in about 25 numbers.

Price of each Number, in a neat paper cover, Thirty Cents.
D. APPLETON & COMPANY, Publishers, 441 & 443 Broadway, New York.

Agents wanted in all parts of the country. TO NEWSPAPERS.—Any newspaper inserting this advertisement 1 month, and noting each number as it appears, will receive a copy of the book, by mail, post paid.

AGENTS WANTED FOR OUR NEW ILLUSTRATED WORK,
MOSES AND THE PROPHETS, CHRIST AND THE APOSTLES, FATHERS AND MARTYRS.

Comprising an account of the Patriarchs and Prophets, the incarnation, crucifixion and ascension of the Saviour of the world, the lives and labors of the Apostles and Primitive Fathers of the Church, and the sufferings of Martyrs who gave up their lives in defense of the truth, embracing a period of more than 3000 years. Compiled from the writings of the most eminent authors of the Christian era, giving in condensed form, a reliable and comprehensive survey of the Christian Church from the early ages of the world down to modern times.

IN FULL OPERATION.

THIS TIME HONORED INSTITUTION IS once more in successful operation, with a FULL CORPS OF PROFESSORS. The chairs of the college are filled by able and experienced men. There are five literary and scientific schools, viz: OF ANCIENT LANGUAGES, CHEMISTRY AND NATURAL PHILOSOPHY, MORAL PHILOSOPHY AND MODERN LANGUAGES. In addition to the above the Board of Trustees have established a school of COMMERCIAL SCIENCE, with the view of giving to the young men of the country a BUSINESS EDUCATION.

To graduates in all these schools, Diplomas are granted and the degrees of Bachelor of Arts and Master of Arts are conferred upon students who accomplish a certain course. The high grade of scholarship formerly required is still maintained. We have a full CHEMICAL and PHYSIOLOGICAL APPARATUS for the illustration of the subjects taught.

The location of the College is unsurpassed for health and geniality. It is situated midway between the mountains and the seaboard; and during a career of thirty-three years, and with thousands of young men in attendance, there has never been a death arising from malaria or other local cause. We profess to educate young men not only mentally but physically also.

BOARD IS SIXTEEN DOLLARS PER MONTH. Tuition from $40 to $90, according to the number of schools attended. $250 will cover expenses of board, tickets for three schools, matriculation and contingent fees for ten months.

Rykens in the college free of time, fuel and lights. Young men who are preparing for the ministry and those disabled by the late war who are unable to pay their tuition, will be allowed to attend on any or all of the schools free of charge.

This College is situated near Boydton, the county seat of Mecklenburg county, Va. Arrangements are made to transport students from Richmond Depot, on the Raleigh and Weldon Railroad, whilst a conveyance leaves Boydton station, on the Richmond and Danville Railroad, on Mondays, Wednesdays and Fridays, and the Wolf Trap Depot, on the same road, Tuesdays, Thursdays and Saturdays.

We solicit a liberal patronage from Maryland, Virginia and North Carolina, from the West, South and South-west.

Students will be received at any time. The second term will commence on the 6th day of February next. Young men will be received and prepared for the College proper. For further particulars address the undersigned at Boydton, Mecklenburg county, Va.

Dr. Winans on Dr. Clarke.
PSALMS.

We publish, for the first time, extracts from a manuscript volume, by Rev. Dr. Winans, entitled—Animadversions upon Dr. Adam Clarke's Commentary on the Holy Bible. This volume has been placed in our hands by the Rev. Dr. Watkins, and we shall from time to time favor the public with portions of its original, characteristic pages.

At the same time, we extend to the reader the words which were understood of what the Messiah was doing for men?

It appears to me that the psalmist speaks these words in his person; but whether he does, or whether he represents the language of the Messiah, there seems to me no kind of difficulty in the passage. It is, as I conceive, an avowal of what must have been a truth in the mouth of both David and the Messiah, and which must forever be true in the mouth of every good man, viz:—that God is not profited by any good that is done by His creatures; but that they may benefit each other. Even Messiah, as surety and Saviour of man, could not advantage the Deity. His goodness could not in that sense extend to God; but how abundantly has it extended to man. The former part of this verse appears to me to contain about the same doctrine as is found in our blessed Lord's injunction—"When ye have done all these things, say ye are unprofitable servants."

—10. "The human body of Jesus Christ, as being without sin, saw no corruption."

I do not conceive that the body of our blessed Saviour escaped corruption because it was without sin; but because he had power, in virtue of His Divinity, to take up life as well as to lay it down. Had the resurrection of the Saviour's body taken place in consequence of its being without sin, and therefore incorruptible, I know no reason why His resurrection should be considered as the earnest, or first fruits, of that of bodies sinful and corruptible. But if the body of the Saviour was liable to corruption, the fiat which determined that it should not see corruption, secured to the whole race, who were bone of His bone and flesh of His flesh, deliverance from those bonds of corruption in which they were held. I have no doubt that the humanity of the Saviour was subject to all the infirmities and diseases, to the death and corruption to which the mass from which it was taken is liable. "And I know not that I should err in supposing that that nature was originally stained with depravity. Certain it is he was the seed of the sinful woman, of sinful Abraham, of the sinful David; and I know not how an evil stalk could produce good seed. But it will be asked, 'was He without sin?' Most certainly He was. It is said by this Divine Saviour in an address to His Heavenly Father, 'A body hast thou prepared me.' I think it not improbable that the principal preparation here spoken of was the purging of that body, or humanity, from its native depravity, and thus rendering it a fit temple for its immaculate inhabitant. This view of this awful subject appears to me much more congenial to the tenor of Scripture than the Doctor's opinion that the Saviour's humanity was a real creation; was naturally immortal and incorruptible; and was thus incorruptible because without sin.

After verse 11, the Doctor gives a Latin version of the psalm found in a Scotico-Anglo psalter, with that translator's version into English, and a paraphrase. This would have been very proper had it thrown any light upon the psalm; but as it does not it is an imposition upon the money, time and patience of the Doctor's readers. I do not think it uncharitable to indulge a fear that the Doctor's chief motive in the frequent introduction of this psalter was to let the world know that he had this antiquarian treasure; and that he was able to read his own language even in its most antiquated form: and I am the more induced to this by frequent unnecessary quotations from the Anglo-Saxon version. When any thing is gained by such quotations the world is obliged to the Doctor for making them; but in far the most instances his work would be by so much the better if they were omitted.

XXII. Title. "To me, many seem to have spent their time very uselessly in the investigation of such subjects."

And I would ask—Where is the author who has spent more time uselessly than the Doctor in such investigations? What imaginable purpose is to be accomplished by the long, long list of the titles of books which the Doctor has given, unless it be to inform his readers of the great extent of his oriental learning?

—12. "All in whose hands were the chief power and influence became David's enemies."

What a strange error is this! Surely the chief power and influence were in the hands of Hushai, Joab, Abishai, and the two priests, Zadoe and Abiathar! Absalom had gained the hearts of the multitude; but by far the greatest number of the chief men of power and influence remained the fast friends of David. It is dangerous to declaim in a commentary.

XXIII. 4. "We are not to suppose that by the rod, correction is meant: there is no idea of this kind either in the text or in the original word; nor has it this meaning in any part of Scripture."

It is difficult to fix on what the Doctor intended as the antecedent to the pronoun in this sentence. If it be the original word then he may be correct for aught I know; but if it be rod, as the construction most naturally requires, then there is a glaring inaccuracy in the assertion.

XL. 7. "The book mentioned here must be the Pentateuch, or five books of Moses; for, in David's time, no other part of Divine Revelation had been committed to writing."

What! not the books of Joshua, Judges, and Ruth? In his preface to the book of Joshua, he gives it as his opinion that the "Book in the main was the composition of Joshua himself." He thinks it "most probable that Samuel wrote the Book of Judges." He also thinks that the substance of what composes the 1st Book of Samuel was committed to writing contemporaneously with the events themselves. Here then are three other parts of divine Revelation committed to writing, if not before the days of David, at least before it is likely he wrote this psalm. Can these contradictions be reconciled? I think not. I have no doubt that not only the four books above mentioned; but the book of Job also, were all committed to writing before this psalm was written; but this, I know, is contrary to one of the Doctor's most beloved theories.

POLYNESIA.—The annual report of the London Missionary Society says:—"Sixty years ago there was not a solitary native Christian in Polynesia; now it would be difficult to find a professed idolater in those islands of Eastern and Western Polynesia where Christian missionaries have been established. The heathen rites of their forefathers have ceased to be practiced. Their heathen legends and war-songs are forgotten. They are gathered together in peaceful village communities. They live under recognized codes of law. They are constructing roads, cultivating their fertile lands, and engaging in commerce. On the return of the Sabbath a very large proportion of the population attend the worship of God. Such are the blessed fruits of Missions in the Isles of the Pacific."

A single thistle, dock, or mullein if allowed to perfect its seeds, and to disseminate them with hindrance, broadcast over the soil, will entail a task work which it will require much painful labor to perform.

ALBERT NYANZA.

One day, at about 3 P. M., the men of Ibrahim started upon some mysterious errand, but returned equally mysterious at about midnight. On the following morning I heard that they had intended to attack some place upon the mountains, but they had heard that it was too powerful, and as "discretion is the better part of valor," they had returned.

On the day following I heard that there had been some disaster, and that the whole of Mohammed Her's party had been massacred. The natives seemed very excited, and messenger succeeded messenger, all confirming the account that Mohammed Her had attacked a village on the mountains, the same that Ibrahim had intended to attack, and that the natives had exterminated their whole party.

On the following morning I sent ten of my men with a party of Ibrahim's to Latome to make inquiries. They returned on the following afternoon, bringing with them two wounded men.

It appeared that Mohammed Her had ordered his party of 110 armed men, in addition to 300 natives, to make a razzia upon a certain village among the mountains for slaves and cattle. They had succeeded in burning a village, and in capturing a great number of slaves. Having descended the pass, a native gave them the route that would lead to the capture of a large herd of cattle that they had not yet discovered. They once more ascended the mountain by a different path, and arriving at the kraal, they commenced driving off the vast herd of cattle. The Latookas, who had not fought while their wives and children were being carried into slavery, now fronted bravely against the muskets to defend their herds, and charging the Turks, they drove them down the pass.

It was in vain that they fought; every bullet aimed at a Latooka struck a rock, behind which the enemy was hidden. Rocks, stones, and lances were hurled at them from all sides and from above; they were forced to retreat. The retreat ended in a panic and precipitate flight. Hemmed in on all sides, amidst a shower of lances and stones thrown from the mountain above, the Turks fled pele mele down the rocky and precipitous ravines. Mistaking their route, they came to a precipice from which there was no retreat. The screaming and yelling savages closed round them. Fighting was useless; the natives, under cover of the numerous detached rocks, billored no mark for an aim; while the crowd of armed savages thrust them forward with wild yells to the very verge of the great precipice about five hundred feet below. Down they fell! hurled to utter destruction by the mass of Latookas pressing onward! A few fought to the last; but one and all were at length forced, by sheer pressure, over the edge of the cliff, and met a just reward for their atrocities.

My men looked utterly cast down, and a feeling of horror pervaded the entire party. No quarter had been given by the Latookas; and upwards of 200 natives, who had joined the slave-hunters in the attack, had also perished with their allies. Mohammed Her had not himself accompanied his people, both he and Bellaal, my late ringleader, having remained in camp; the latter having, fortunately for him, been disabled, and placed hors de combat by the example I had made during the mutiny. My men were almost green with awe, when I asked them solemnly, "Where were the men who had deserted from me?" Without answering a word they brought two of my guns and laid them at my feet. They were covered with clotted blood mixed with sand, which had hardened like cement over the locks and various portions of the barrels. My guns were all marked. As I looked at the numbers upon the stocks, I repeated aloud the names of the owners. "Are they all dead?" I asked. "All dead," the men replied. "Food for the vultures?" I asked. "Nope of the bodies can be recovered," faltered my vakeel. "The two guns were brought from the spot by some natives who escaped, and who saw the men fall. They are killed." "Better for them had they remained with me and done their duty. The hand of God is heavy," I replied. My men slunk away abashed, leaving the gory witnesses of defeat and death upon the ground. I called Saat and ordered him to give the two guns to Richard to clean.

Not only my own men but the whole of Ibrahim's party were of opinion that I had some mysterious connexion with the disaster that had befallen my mutineers. All remembered the bitterness of my prophecy, "The vultures will pick their bones," and this terrible mishap having occurred so immediately afterwards took a strong hold upon their superstitious minds. As I passed through the camp the men would quietly exclaim, "Wah Ilahi Hawaga!" (my God! Master.) To which I simply replied, "Robine fe!" (there is a God.) From that moment I observed an extraordinary change in the manner of both my people and those of Ibrahim, all of whom now paid us the greatest respect.

Unfortunately a great change had likewise taken place in the manner of the Latookas. The whole town was greatly excited, drums were beating and horns blowing in all quarters, every one rejoicing at the annihilation of Mohammed Her's party. The natives no longer respected the superior power of guns; in a hand-to-hand fight they had proved their own superiority, and they had not the sense to distinguish the difference between a struggle in a steep mountain pass and a battle on the open plain. Ibrahim was apprehensive of a general attack on his party by the Latookas.

This was rather awkward, as it was necessary for him to return to Gondokoro for a large supply of ammunition which had been left there for want of porters to convey it, when he had started for the interior. To march to Gondokoro, and to guard the ammunition, would require a large force in the present disturbed state of the country; thus we should be a much-reduced party, which might induce the Latookas to attack us after his departure. However, it was necessary that he should start. I accordingly lent him a couple of donkeys to convey his powder, in case he should not be able to procure porters.

After the departure of Ibrahim, the force of his party, remaining at Tarrangolle, was reduced to thirty-five men, under the command of his lieutenant, Suleiman. This was a weak detachment in the event of an attack, especially as they had no separate camp, but were living in the native town, the men quartered in detached huts, and accordingly at the mercy of the natives if surprised. The brutality of the Turks was so inseparable from their nature, that they continually insulted the native women to such an extent that I felt sure they would provoke hostilities in the present warlike humor of the Latookas. The stream being nearly a mile distant, there was a difficulty in procuring water. The Turks being far too lazy to carry it for themselves, seized upon the water-jars when the women returned from the stream, and beat them severely upon their refusal to deliver them without payment. I found no difficulty, as I engaged a woman to bring a regular supply for a daily payment in beads. Much bartering was going on between the Turks and the natives for provisions, in which the latter were invariably cheated, and beaten if they complained. I felt sure that such conduct must end in disagreement, if not in actual fight, in the event of which I knew that I should be dragged into the affair, although perfectly innocent, and having nothing to do with the Turks.

My quarters in the town were near an open quadrangular space about eighty yards square, inclosed upon all sides, but having a narrow entrance to the main street. The Turks were scattered about in the neighboring lanes, their time passed in drinking merissa, and quarreling with the natives and with each other.

The day after Ibrahim's departure, the Turks seized some jars of water by force from the women on their return from the stream. A row ensued, and ended by one of the women being shamefully maltreated; and a Latooka, who came to her assistance, was severely beaten. This I did not see, but it was reported to me. I called Suleiman, and told him that if such things were permitted it would entail a fight with the natives, in which I should not allow my men to join; that I prohibited my men from taking any thing from the Latookas without just payment; thus, should a fight be caused by the conduct of his people, they must get out of it as they best could.

A bad feeling already existed between the natives and his people, owing to the defeat of the party of Mohammed Her. Much good management was required to avoid a collision, and the reverse was certain to cause an outbreak.

Shortly before dusk the women were again assaulted on their return with water from the stream. One of Ibrahim's soldiers threatened a powerful-looking Amazon with his stick because she refused to deliver up her jar of water that she had carried about a mile for her own requirements. Upon seeing this my pretty friend, Bokke, the chief's wife, seized the soldier by the throat, wrested the stick from him, while another woman disarmed him of his gun. Other women then sat upon him, and gave him a most ignominious shaking; while some gathered up mud from the gutter and poured it down the barrel of his gun until they effectually choked it; not content with this, they plastered large masses of mud over the locks and trigger.

I looked on with enjoyment at the thorough discomfiture of the Turk. The news quickly spread, and in revenge for his disgrace his comrades severely beat some women at some distance from the camp. I heard screams, and shouts, and a confused noise; and upon my arrival outside the town, I saw large numbers of natives running from all quarters, and collecting together with lances and shields. I felt sure that we were to be involved in a general outbreak. However, the Turks beat the drum, and collected their men, so that in a few minutes no straggler was in the town.

It was remarkably unpleasant to be dragged into a row by the conduct of these brutal traders, with whom I had nothing in common; and who, should a fight actually occur, would be certain to behave as cowards. The Latookas would make no distinction between me and them, in the event of an attack, as they would naturally class all strangers and new-comers with the hated Turks.

It was about 5 P. M., one hour before sunset. The woman who usually brought us water delivered her jar, but disappeared immediately after without sweeping the courtyard, as was her custom. Her children, who usually played in the inclosure, had vanished. On searching her hut, which was in one corner of the yard, no one was to be found, and even the grinding-stone was gone. Suspecting that something was in the wind, I sent Karka and Gaddum Her, the two black servants, to search in various huts in the neighborhood to observe if the owners were present, and whether the women were in their houses. Not a woman could be found. Neither woman nor child remained in the large town of Tarrangolle. There was an extraordinary stillness where usually all was noise and chattering. All the women and children had been removed to the mountains about two miles distant, and this so quickly and noiselessly that it appeared incredible.

I immediately sent to the house of the chief, and requested his attendance. There were two chiefs, brothers; My was the greater in point of rank, but his brother, Commoro, had more actual authority with the people. I was glad that the latter appeared.

I sent to request an interpreter from the Turks, and upon his arrival I asked Commoro why the women and children had been removed? He replied, "That the Turks were so brutal that he could not prevail upon his people to endure it any longer; their women were robbed and beaten, and they were all so ill-treated, that he, as their chief, had no longer any control over them; and that the odium of having introduced the Turks to Latooka was thrown upon him." I asked him whether any of my men had misbehaved. I explained that I should flog any one of my men who should steal the merest trifle from his people, or insult any women. All my men were in dark-brown uniforms. He said, "That none of the men with the brown clothes had been complained of, but that his people had taken a dislike to all strangers, owing to the conduct of the Turks, and that he could not answer for the consequences." There was a division among his own people, some wishing to fight and to serve the Turks as the Latookas had served the party of Mohammed Her, and others yielding to his advice, and agreeing to remain quiet.

I inquired whether the chief, Moy, intended peace or war? He said, "That Bokke, his wife, had made him very angry against the Turks by describing their conduct towards the women."

This was rather an unsatisfactory state of things. Commoro departed, frankly admitting that the natives were much excited and wished to attack, but that he would do his best with them.

These rascally traders set every country in a blaze by their brutal conduct; and rendered exploring not only most dangerous but next to impossible, without an exceedingly powerful force.

The sun set, and, as usual in tropical climates, darkness set in within half an hour. Not a woman had returned to the town, nor was the voice of a dog to be heard. The natives had entirely forsaken the portion of the town that both I and the Turks occupied.

The night was perfectly calm, and the stars shone so brightly that I took an observation for the latitude—four degrees and thirty minutes.

There was a death-like stillness in the air. Even the Turks, who were usually uproarious, were perfectly quiet, and although my men made no remark, it was plain that we were all occupied by the same thoughts, and that an attack was expected.

It was about 9 o'clock, and the stillness had become almost painful. There was no cry of a bird; not even the howl of a hyena; the camels were sleeping; but every man was wide awake, and the sentries well on the alert. We were almost listening at the supernatural stillness, if I may so describe the perfect calm, when, suddenly, every one started at the deep and solemn boom of the great war drum, or nogara. Three distinct beats, at slow intervals, rang through the apparently deserted town, and echoed loudly from the neighboring mountain. It was the signal! A few minutes elapsed, and like a distant echo from the north the three mournful tones again distinctly sounded. Was it an echo? Impossible. Now from the south, far distant, but unmistakable, the same three regular beats came booming through the still night air. Again and again, from every quarter, spreading far and wide, the signal was responded; and the whole country echoed those three solemn notes so full of warning. Once more the great nogara of Tarrangolle sounded the original alarm within a few hundred paces of our quarters. The whole country was up.

There was no doubt about the matter. The Turks well knew those three notes were the war-signal of the Latookas.

I immediately called Suleiman. It was necessary to act in unison. I ordered him to beat the drum loudly for about five minutes to answer the nogara. His men were all scattered in several small inclosures. I called them all out into the open quadrangle; in the center of which I placed the baggage, and planted the English ensign in the middle, while the Turks fixed their flag within a few paces. Posting sentries at each corner of the square, I stationed patrols in the principal street. In the meantime Mrs. Baker had laid out upon a mat several hundred cartridges of buck-shot, powder-flasks, wadding, and opened several boxes of caps, all of which were neatly arranged for a reserve of ammunition; while a long row of first-class double guns and rifles lay in readiness. The boy Saat was full of fight, and immediately strapped on his belt and cartouche-box, and took his stand among the men.

I ordered the men, in the event of an attack, to immediately set fire to all the huts around the quadrangle; in which case the sudden rush of a large body of men would be impossible, and the huts being of straw, the town would be quickly in a blaze.

Every thing was in order to resist an attack in five minutes from the sounding of the nogara. * *

The morning broke and saw the men still under arms, but the excitement had passed. The women soon re-appeared with their water-jars as usual, but on this occasion they were perfectly unmolested by the Turks, who, having passed the night in momentary expectation of an attack, were now upon their best behavior. However, I heard them muttering among themselves, "Wait until Ibrahim returns with reinforcements and ammunition, and we will pay the Latookas for last night."

The town filled; and the Latookas behaved as though nothing out of the common had occurred; but when questioned, they coolly confessed that they had intended to surprise us, but that we were too "wide awake." It is extraordinary that these fellows are so stupid as to beat the drum or nogara before the attack, as it naturally gives the alarm, and renders a surprise impossible; nevertheless, the war-drum is always a preliminary step to hostilities.

For the N. O. Christian Advocate.

WEALTH.

There is nothing sinful in the possession of riches, if honestly obtained. Many of the brightest examples of piety recorded in the Bible, were rich. Abraham was very rich in cattle, in silver and in gold. Isaac and Jacob were rich; David, Josiah, Hezekiah, and other kings of Judah, were surrounded with wealth. Zaccheus, the publican, who entertained the Saviour, and Joseph of Arimathea, who begged his body for interment, were rich men. It is therefore evident, that the mere possession of wealth, is not by any means sinful. And yet our Saviour emphatically declares, that it is with great difficulty a rich man enters into the kingdom of God. Let us now enquire whence the difficulty of a rich man's salvation? It arises first, from the tendency of riches to produce pride and self-dependence. As riches command all the luxuries of life, and give power and influence to their possessors, it is natural to trust in them; and to lose sight of our own unworthiness, and sinfulness, and become vain in our imaginations, and puffed up with a sense of our importance; and look with contempt upon the poor, who have not been so fortunate as ourselves. Now it is said that God resisteth the proud, while he gives grace to the humble. Pride shuts God out of the heart, and thus bars the gate of heaven against its possessor.

In the next place wealth surrounds us with flatterers. Influenced by self-interest, they use flattering speeches, calculated to cause us to form a false estimate of our own characters; and to think more highly of ourselves than we ought to think; thus blinding us to our faults and imperfections; and causing even our sins to assume the character of virtues. How difficult under such circumstances, to realize our guilt in the sight of God; and come to him with humble and heartfelt penitence, for pardon and salvation! How hard for such a person to consent to receive salvation on the same terms as the poor ragged beggar at his gate!

Again, the cares and responsibilities of riches, crowd out the claims of religion. It requires the same industry and vigilance to retain wealth, as to secure it. The rich man finds his time and thoughts so occupied with the world, that he cannot find time to devote to the claims of his soul. His mind and heart are completely pre-occupied, and there is no room for Christ. He becomes blinded by the god of this world; the claims of business press upon him by day, and occupy his thoughts by night. This world looms up before him, and shuts out the light of eternity from his view. The associations of the wealthy are generally unfavorable to genuine piety. The rich man naturally chooses his associates from that class who are, like himself, wealthy and worldly minded. Paul says, "Not many wise men after the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble are called; but God hath chosen the foolish things of the world to confound the wise; and God hath chosen the weak things of the world to confound the things which are mighty, and base things and things which are despised, hath God chosen, yea and things that are not to bring to nought things that are; that no flesh should glory in his presence." Again, James says, "Hath not God chosen the poor of this world, rich in faith, heirs of the kingdom which he hath promised to them that love him?" A man's associates have a powerful influence over him, and if these are unfriendly to piety, they will increase the difficulty of his salvation.

Those who possess riches are apt to trust in them. As wealth will command all sensual delights and gratifications, we are liable to look to them for happiness, and despise the spiritual blessings which they have no power to command, and which are alone secured by the renunciation of the world, and a life of self denial, cross bearing, and consecration to God. Worldly wealth, when used for the glory of God, may become a means of grace, and a source of much pure and hallowed enjoyment; but when made an object of idolatry, and allowed to occupy the place in our affections which is due to God alone, it becomes a snare and shuts Christ and his great salvation out of the heart. God is a jealous God, and he will not give his glory to another, neither will he share his temple with an idol.

We may learn from this subject not to envy the rich. When we consider the danger of riches, the wealthy are surely not objects of envy. Viewed in the light of the Scriptures, and with a proper estimate of the worth of the soul, and the eternal consequences involved, the rich are more properly objects of commiseration than of envy.

We should not make the accumulation of riches the grand end of our existence, as too many do. It is proper to prosecute our lawful business with industry and economy, but with higher objects than the mere accumulation of wealth. We should "use the world as not abusing it, seeing the fashion of it is passing away." We should use our acquisitions for the promotion of the cause of Christ; to do good, not laying up our treasures upon earth where moth and rust corrupt and where thieves break through and steal; but in heaven where they will not be subject to such vicissitudes.

We should never, for a moment, compromise honesty, truth, or christian principle of any kind, to secure wealth; for, says Jesus, "What is a man profited if he should gain the whole world and lose his own soul?" O! how often do professing christians make sinful compromises to secure, or retain, worldly gain; and how has Christ been wounded in the house of his friends by such conduct! What encouragement to the enemy to blasphemy, and what destruction of confidence in the power of religion have been given by the unsanctified love of riches, so often manifested by the professed followers of Christ!

If we are in the possession of worldly wealth, we should learn not to trust in riches, but consecrate our wealth to the glory of God; using it as a talent for which he will hold us accountable in a future state. We should see that a due proportion of our income be appropriated to the advancement of Christ's kingdom and glory. We should sympathize with the poor and destitute, and strive to ameliorate their condition. Who that truly believes God's word would not desire to secure the rich blessings pronounced upon the man that considers the poor, in the 41st psalm? "Blessed is he that considereth the poor; the Lord will deliver him in time of trouble. The Lord will preserve him and keep him alive; and he shall be blessed upon the earth; and thou wilt not deliver him unto the will of his enemies. The Lord will strengthen him upon the bed of languishing; thou wilt make all his bed in his sickness." Here are blessings which wealth cannot command in any other way than as appropriated to the cause of benevolence. Let these promises be placed in contrast with the doom of the miserable rich epicure, described by Jesus in the 16th chapter of Luke, "The rich man also died and was buried, and in hell he lifted up his eyes, being in torments, and surely it should not require a moment's deliberation to decide between the two. Rich men should tremble in view of their fearful responsibility, and the dangerous ground they occupy. May God help us all to live wisely, that we may secure his divine approbation, and be found rich towards him in time and eternity. A RICH POOR MAN.

Columbus, Miss., 1867.

There were two remarkable periods of Christ's life, His infancy and His exit. His entrance into His public ministry at His baptism, and His finishing it at His passion; and at both we have the devil fiercely encountering Him. When the christian is about some noble enterprise for God's glory, then Satan will be like a serpent, in the way; "an adder in the path, that biteth his horse's heels, so that his rider shall fall backward."

CHINA MISSION.

SHANGHAI, Dec. 8, 1866.

To DR. E. W. SEHON, Corresponding Secretary for Missionary Board, Methodist Episcopal Church, South.

MY DEAR BROTHER:—I have just had an application from a Japanese officer and two foreign gentlemen—one an Englishman, resident at Hakodadi, and the other an American, of this place—to establish an Anglo-Japanese school for the instruction of Japanese youth (the sons of officers and wealthy persons in Japan) in the English language and science.

The occasion of this demand is the recent removal by treaty stipulations of the restrictions forbidding the Japanese to leave their country either for purposes of pleasure or business. Great numbers are availing of these newly granted privileges to visit foreign countries, and there are constant arrivals here of students en route both to Europe and America.

The officer above mentioned is also making preparations to leave for Europe by an early opportunity. He says there are great numbers who wish to avail themselves of English tuition, but desire to obtain it without having to leave home so far, and as Shanghai will afford far greater facilities for learning the language, and observing both foreign customs and improvements beyond anything at present in Japan, he hoped that a suitable school might be established here, and desired that I would consent to take the superintendency and management of the same. I was certainly very thankful to have such a favorable opportunity of doing good, of extending the knowledge of Western civilization, and especially of preparing their minds for the ultimate reception and adoption of Christianity, but hesitated a long while, fearing lest such a step might not be concurred in by the Board. I conferred with others here, who have schools for the Chinese, and also called with the Japanese officer and the English gentleman to see the Anglo-Chinese school in the foreign settlement of Shanghai, but found them quite unwilling to accept any accommodations in conjunction with the Chinese. He said it was their intention, on quitting Japan, to leave it altogether behind them, doff their former customs and habits, and become, while students, Englishmen in costume, diet, and manners; hence they wished to be quite distinct, and unassociated with the Chinese, whom they regard as far inferior to themselves. Finally I consented, and told them I would undertake its management for one year. I made a sad mistake by not accepting, while in my power, the full management of the Imperial Chinese School, in the city of Shanghai. In constant hope that the Board might be able to renew our remittances, and enable us to devote our whole time to more direct Mission work, I refused to accept it for a longer period than six months, when I might have held it for three years. Such schools afford the finest fields for Mission work now open in China, for the simple reason that we have to do with the very highest and most influential classes, men who are intelligent, and who devote themselves directly in these schools to an acquisition of civilized principles, which, when adopted, will necessarily lead to an abandonment of their absurdities and superstitions.

One of the students of that school has applied to me for admission to the Church, and I have him under instruction, with a view to ultimately receiving baptism. As I have accepted the management of the Anglo-Japanese school for a period of one year. I hope you will give me an expression of opinion on the subject of its future continuance, for I think it very desirable, if it can be sustained here for a number of years, to have it in conjunction with our Mission. It has the favor of the merchants here because they expect to enhance their interests thereby, and of the Missionaries, because they see in it a preparation for the Gospel and Christianity.

It cannot be undertaken, perhaps, till next spring. However, the English gentleman and the officer have returned to Japan, for the present, in hope of sending over, at an early date, the first installment of pupils to begin with.

My boat is waiting for me at the Jetty, and the tide has come, so I must desist at present, and leave for my appointments in the country, 16 and 20 miles distant. However, I must add that Brother Wood, with his two children, left us on the fifth of December, in the clipper ship "Antelope," consigned to Olyphant & Co., New York. His passage amounts to four hundred (400) gold dollars, payable at New York, thirty days sight, for which I gave (as Treasurer of the Mission) an order on W. T. Smithson, Treasurer, Baltimore. His passage is cheap, and the ship a fine one, for which we are indebted to the kindness of Messrs. Olyphant & Co. They expect to arrive in March.

The Mission Treasury is again empty. We have nothing to begin the next quarter, in January, with. The debt amounts to two thousand taels, with interest for one year, payable in April and May. [Remark.—Two thousand taels are about ($4500) forty-five hundred greenbacks.] Besides that amount, we want something for 1867, as Missionary expenses.

I will write you a summary of the events of this quarter by the next mail if possible. All well at present.

Yours, in great haste, YOUNG J. ALLEN.

THE TRUE CHURCH.

Q. What is a church of God?

A. A church is a company of believers under Jesus Christ as the Head, organized into one body.

Q. Who are the officers of the Church?

A. The minister, or bishop, or pastor, sometimes called elder, 1 Tim. 3: 17, appointed to preach and perform other duties. Elders and deacons. Phil. 1; Acts 6: 1, 2, 3, to 7.

Q. Is there any definition of a church in the Bible?

A. Yes, in 1 Cor. 1, 2: "Unto the church of God which is at Corinth, to them that are sanctified in Christ Jesus, called to be saints, with all that in every place call upon the name of Jesus Christ our Lord, both theirs and ours." A true church of God, then, consists of persons "called to be saints." They "are sanctified," they "call upon the name of Jesus Christ our Lord," and "in every place" where they are thus characterized, they are or can become a church.

Q. What are the marks of a true church?

A. Unity in the fundamental doctrines of the Gospel; holiness, catholicism, embracing all believers in all nations; charity and love to God and man, white or black, or all mankind, of whatever color or degree.

This is the church of God; its existence is independent of man, priest, king, prince, magistrate, government, republic, monarchy, despotism, the favor or frown of men. Every person, man, woman, or child who repents and believes in this Lord Jesus Christ, is a member of the church, no matter whether in Lapland, or Japan, or New Zealand, South, East, West, or North. It is a church over which the Lord Jesus presides by his Spirit. He alone admits the members, though they may be thrust aside and rejected. It is a church that depends not upon forms or vestments, or baptism, or the Lord's Supper, or any sort of Papal ritualism. Like the penitent thief, a person may have no opportunity of being baptized, yet may become a member of this church. He may be thrust into prison, may be excommunicated, but that cannot exclude him from this church. Wherever the members of this church meet, they are agreed, and have one spirit, desire, purpose, and heart about things relating to Christ, his kingdom, peace, members, prayer, Bible missions, preaching, conversions, the need of Christian effort, the extension of the Gospel and its ordinances.

Q. Are ministers, or bishops, or presbyters successors of the Apostles?

A. They are ordinary successors, but not inspired nor endowed with the gifts of the Apostles to work miracles.

Q. Is a church infallible?

A. No; because it is not inspired. The Word of God alone is infallible, because it is divinely inspired by the Holy Ghost. A church is made up of human beings, and every one of those persons is liable to err, and is, therefore, fallible. A council, Roman or Protestant, consisting of five hundred or one thousand persons or priests, is fallible, for five hundred fallibles cannot make an infallible. But the Papal Council of Trent pretended to enact "infallible dogmas"!

Q. Is there such a thing as "apostolic succession"?

A. Not at all in the sense of Rome, for two reasons, viz, first, "apostolic succession" requires the same authority as the Apostles and the same power to work miracles which ceased with the Apostles. And second, "apostolic succession" in the sense of the Papal Church is only a pretence; for Peter, from whom they take their pretended succession, was no Pope. We never read in the New Testament of Pope Peter, nor Pope Paul, nor Pope John, nor of any other Pope. The Apostles were all on an equality; no one was superior to another, nor had any superior jurisdiction. Besides, the claim is absurd from the fact that, at one and the same time, two Popes, at another time three Popes, at another time four Popes, all claimed to sit on the Papal throne, and which was the true Pope, it would puzzle more than Balaam; with the help of his heast, to tell. Not only has this Papal succession been broken time and again, but wars, tumults, displacements, confusion, changes of government, and the debaucheries, corruptions, simony, immoralities and cruelties of Papal usurpers, which agitated and vexed the world during the long period of twelve hundred years from the establishment of Popery, in the seventh century, to the date of Pius Nono, render the whole pretended line a mere fable.

Q. Are there spurious or false churches as well as a true one?

A. Yes, there have been, as foretold by our Lord in Matthew, 24th chapter, many false Christs who would say, "Lo, here is Christ, or there; believe it not. For there shall arise false Christs and false prophets, and shall show great signs and wonders; insomuch that, if it were possible, they shall deceive the very elect." But he warns us not to believe their imposing pretensions. False Christs and false churches may hold forth their worship in pomp and ostentatious shows. They may deck themselves in silken vestments and jewels and pearls; they may ornament their churches in fine and splendid drapery, and conduct their worship with the most imposing ceremonies and melodious music; but these very exhibitions are adapted as spectacles to the eye and the ear, and touch not the springs of devotion, nor awaken the slumbering issues of the heart. They are not adapted to the simplicity of the Gospel. They amuse children and superficial minds. They are but the mimicry of the tawdry ornaments and puerile display of Pagan temples. The signs of impostors may also appear in other shapes. But the absence of the marks of the true church enumerated above, prove them to be spurious impositions upon the credulity of ignorance and the idle gaze of a superficial multitude.

TESTED BY SCRIPTURE.

"Baptism doth also now save us, not the putting away of the filth of the flesh, but the answer of a good conscience towards God."—1 Peter 3: 21.

It is a peculiar excellency of our religion that it does not much employ our care about matters of ceremony, but chiefly about works of substantial duty. Its design is, not to amuse our fancies with empty shows, but to render us truly like God, full of love to him and good-will to each other, and to fit us for that society above to which we are destined. Yet, as ceremony is powerful in representing the truth, and as it oftentimes strongly affects our minds, it has pleased the Divine wisdom to appoint a few solemn and significant rites for the purpose of setting forth its doctrines and warming our devotion. Such is the purpose of the ordinance of baptism. We are born into the world children of wrath, and therefore when we become holy, or children of grace, we enter upon a new mode of spiritual existence, or as Scripture terms it, we are "born again;" and as this conversion from evil to good, from darkness to light is a matter of first importance, God has seen fit to represent it before our eyes by an outward symbol. Water applied to personal uncleanness washes it away, and so water is publicly poured upon the penitent one to show that thus by the outpouring of the Holy Spirit our internal corruptions are purified. Thus two things are the proper elements of every true baptism, the outward and visible sign, and the inward and spiritual grace. The symbol is external and ecclesiastical; the thing symbolized is internal and spiritual. But here comes in a very interesting question. Does the outward sign insure and prove the inward grace? When man comes to the ordinance does God invariably come with his Spirit? The Church of Rome teaches the affirmative; it declares that regeneration is connected with the actual performance of the rite. From a Papal Prayer-Book, I gather the following expressions: "The sacraments are the channels of Divine grace; through them the merits of Christ abundantly flow into our souls;" "by baptism we are cleansed from sin; it imprints an indelible character or spiritual mark in the soul which always remains." In another place, I find this and other rites stated to be "instrumental causes of Divine grace in our souls." The Romanist therefore considers the baptized to be by that very act regenerate, and all of the un baptized to be unregenerate. Others deny this; they affirm that God gives his grace before, or at, or after baptism without any particular rule of this kind; that he has not connected the outpouring of his Spirit with any ordinance necessarily in this way; that the material element of the water of baptism is never made the instrument or channel of communicating heavenly blessings; that the operations of the Spirit are like those of the wind, of which we cannot tell whence it cometh or whither it goeth, and that they cannot be limited to any particular time, place, manner, or mode.

I propose at this time, in accordance with the sixth article of the Church, which says: "Holy Scripture containeth all things necessary to salvation, so that whatsoever is not read therein, nor may be proved thereby, is not to be required of any man that it should be believed an article of faith, or be thought requisite to salvation," to discuss the question solely by the light of divine truth, and fortunately find testimony very clear and explicit. Various means are stated in the Bible by which the Spirit operates in making us new creatures; but the grand instrument is declared to be the Holy Scriptures themselves. "Wo are again," says St. Peter, "not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible by the word of God." "The word," declares our Saviour, "Of his own will begat he us in the word of truth," says St. James. And no one can fail to notice that baptism is always coupled with repentance and faith as alone the ordinance any value, "that believeth and is baptized shall be saved," says our Lord. What the church inquires of Philip, "What doth hinder me to be baptized?" he is told, "If thou believe with all thy heart thou mayest." "Repent," said St. Peter to the Jews, "and be baptized." The jailor of Philippi was baptized in consequence of his faith. With these spiritual qualifications, therefore, existing beforehand, the sacrament is worthless. A fact in very plain testimony in the word of Christ: "He that believeth shall be damned," that is, who they have been baptized or. And certainly if baptism in regeneration, St. Paul would have written those remarkable words to the Corinthians: "If God that I baptized none of you, but Crispus and Gaius; for I sent me not to baptize, but to preach the Gospel." Had he considered simple rite as effectual to salvation he would have baptized every Corinthian who would have parted him, and like a Romish missionary have compelled crowds to neighboring streams to receive ordinance at his hands. They may go through the whole of it, and we shall find our justification to come from faith and not baptism, and when we would who are the redeemed of God, not directed to search the registers to find the record of baptized, but to judge by the "By their fruits ye shall know them." "He that is born of God overcometh the world."

The only difficulty that has arisen in regard to the testimony of Scripture on this subject, has come from the perversion of some of its phrases and illustrations; there is necessity for any misunderstanding a plain, candid man, entirely biased either way, from perverting the Sacred Word, would derive precisely the same views that have just been expressed; but the Church, to support its own tenet, has given to the figures of Bible a meaning that was not intended. Thus when Christ said of the bread of the Lord's Supper, "This is my body," we know meant "this represents my body." When Moses denominated paschal lamb "the Lord's over," we know that he meant the lamb represented the act of passing over the houses of Israelites; when Christ calls himself a door, a vine, a shield, or rock, we know at once that expressions represent the attributes in which he stands to his people. We use this kind of language every day in our common intercourse without any confusion and Common sense teaches us that sign is used for the thing signified. Thus as water is the mode of cleansing the body of impurity; it is once or twice as of as cleansing us from sin; every such place every one can tell that it is adopted only as a figure. In Isaiah it is said: "I will water upon him that is thirsty, and floods upon the dry ground. This is the symbol. The symbolized comes out in the verse: "I will pour my Spirit upon thee, and my blessing upon offsprings." In the same way said in Ezekiel: "I will sprinkle clean water upon you, and ye shall be clean. I will put my law within you, and cause you to follow my statutes." In just this regeneration being an entire change of our corrupt nature, is a washing, and a baptism; in each case we see at once from context, that the thing meant is not the outward form, but the inward change of heart. Thus Titus declares: "Not by works of righteousness which we have done, but according to his mercy he saved us, by the washing of regeneration, and renewing of the Holy Ghost; so as he might shew unto us the word of the Gospel, and so if our text stood only, "Baptism doth now also save might possibly be misconstrued, and with a show of reason perverted as it has been to prove the efficacy of the mere ceremony; but the Apostle fearing lest the impenitent and the ungodly might presume on salvation simply from the outward rite, without the inward renewal of the Spirit, puts down, both before and after, safeguards against such perversion; the whole passage, therefore, is this: "The passage, wherein, even baptism, like figure, doth save us (not the putting away of the filth of the flesh, but the answer of a good conscience toward God);" as if he said, "Be not deceived; I have just called the inward thing by the name of its outward sign, I have spoken of regeneration as baptism; and ascribed salvation to the latter; but remember, it is only a metaphor; it is not external washing I am thinking of, which can only cleanse the filth from the flesh; I really refer to that work of the Spirit in the soul which consists in enlightening the conscience, and enabling it to make a good report to God of the excellence and grace that is within."

HONDURAS.

The following letter from our old fellow-citizen, Colonel MANUEL W. CHAPMAN, to a lady friend, has been kindly placed in our hands for publication, the recipient wishing to satisfy the inquiries of the many, who, impatient of tyranny and despotism, and hopeless of brighter days, are dreaming of new homes in other lands, under other skies.

BERLIE, March 9, 1867.

MY DEAR MAMAM:—You requested me shortly before my departure from New Orleans, to write you in detail touching the foreign land, which I was about to visit. In compliance therewith, I have ennobled the first hour of leisure to attempt a faithful delineation of this strange, very strange country. I trust the picture will not be devoid of interest to you. First impressions are generally, if not the most truthful, at least the most vivid, and if I had been dropped into the heart of China, I can assure you the sensations of novelty could hardly have been more aroused than they were on the evening of my arrival in this colony. At the very outset the difficulty of infrequent and uncomfortable transportation confronts the emigrant, as the rare and steamers never ply between ports of the United States and these parts, and you must be prepared, even if wind and weather be propitious, for much discomfort, cooped up as you will be in the narrow confines of a schooner's cabin. The discomfort will be greatly augmented if tempestuous weather should (as was my chance) overtake you. Nine days, about an average passage, elapsed from our departure from the mouth of the Mississippi to our arrival at this port. The trip, however, with a fair wind, can be made in less than half that time. The first land usually made is Half-Moon Cay, where a pilot comes aboard, thence to the town, the channel winds among a succession of islands clothed with a profusion of verdure to the water's edge. We first caught a glimpse of palm trees at Cay Bokol, an inlet which rather resembles the vignette of some book of travels than any thing we had before seen in nature. The land rises on all sides from a snow white beach to the center, which is crowned by a diadem of cocoa palms. Half way up the crest of the hill there is a succession of thatched cottages, embosomed in a grove of palms, plantains and bananas, while a towering bamboo signal-staff marks the home of the pilot for outward bound vessels. Extending far out into the sea are tongues of coral reefs, covered with the singular mangrove tree, whose trunk ceases and whose roots commence branching out like a series of tripods two or three feet from the sea level. The gorgeous emerald, purple, blue and bronze tints of these tropical waters, surpass any thing seen in more temperate seas. They almost realize my dreams of the pavement of heaven.

On coming to anchor, a quarter of a mile from the wharf, we were boarded by Mr. Locke, of her Britannic Majesty's custom service, a mulatto, whose crisped wool and tawny hue demonstrated that some of his illustrious ancestors once sweltered beneath the sultry sun of Africa. By the courtesy of the British Honduras company we were put ashore in their comfortable yacht. But alas! nothing like a hotel, in our sense of the term, opened its hospitable doors to our little band; true, we at last sought refuge in the "Belize aristocratic hotel," with different accommodations—a literal transcript of the sign-board: decipher its meaning if you can. "Mine inn" was an edifice in no respect superior to an ordinary negro cabin at home, I say in no respect, but I must confess that the exquisite cleanliness of the sheets and table-cloths, as well as the polite attendance of our black host, Mr. Brackman, made some amends. We slept soundly that night, though the motley colored inhabitants kept up an incessant din till midnight. But our stay at the 'aristocratic' was a short one. In two days after arrival we rented a neat little cottage of three rooms near the sea side, where the wind hymns its Eolian tones through the palms, soothing alike the body and the mind with its cool breath.

The town, said to contain about 5000 inhabitants, is laid off without the slightest regard to regularity, upon both sides of the river, which is spanned by a pretty bridge. It is scrupulously clean, thanks to excellent sanitary regulations rigidly enforced, hence its freedom from epidemics for nearly twenty years. Flocks of "John Crows," a species of domestic turkey buzzard, remove every vestige of filth from the streets, while shoals of catfish perform the same scavenger office for the harbor. The streets are paved with shells, like the New Orleans shell roads, and though wide enough, are destitute of sidewalks. Troops of "fiddlers," a kind of land crab, scamper along the beach and form an excellent meal for the hungry ducks who are always on the qui-vire for the delicate morsel. The houses are built with a view to ventilation, and are devoid of all architectural pretensions. The Wesleyan church, however, is a magnificent edifice, built of English brick, with stained glass windows, and an interior of the richest mahogany. It would be an ornament to any town.

Words would fail me to describe one half of the glorious trees of this lovely country; and were I to dilate upon the royal palm, rising like an obelisk of granite capped by a crown of verdure, the cocoanut tree, bending beneath its weight of half a ton of nuts, the cahoun palm which grows on the ridges in avenues a mile long, like the aisles of a gigantic cathedral, the stately mahogany which resembles our pecan tree, except in size and profusion of leaves, the spreading tamarind with its flakes of foliage, the bread fruit with its large serrated leaves, the plantain and the banana, whose fruits are the staple food of the country, and whose fringed leaves never cease swinging to the breeze, the delicate mango tree, which is somewhat like our peach, the naked frangipani with its fragrant flowers—were I to dilate, I say, upon these my letter should swell to a volume. Let us from the poetical to the practical.

We pay twelve dollars per month rent, five dollars for a nurse, six for a cook, and an average daily expense at market of about fifty cents for each person, servants not included. In this estimate is included our grocery bill. Upon this we fair sumptuously. Beef is very indifferent and expensive. Fresh pork fat and fine, but dear. Green turtle abundant, delicious and cheap. For twelve and a half cents we can have a delicious mess of fish fresh from the water, and often alive when sold. In truth, fish and fruit are our chief subsistence. Of the most esteemed varieties which are found on the gulf coast, we have the Shad, the Snapper, the Grouper, the Sheephead and the Pompano, here called the Pompos. Besides these there are some with queer names, such as the Gaunt and Barracouta, the Devil fish, the Angel fish, the Hog fish, the Jew fish, the Doctor, so called from a transparent lancet hidden in a fold of the skin near the tail, and the Parrot fish, of a brilliant blue color and with hooked bill like his namesake. Crawfish over a foot in length, and having teeth larger than the molar teeth of man, make a savory stew. Conchs well prepared almost equal oysters in flavor. The Iguana lizard is universally eaten; its flesh resembles chicken. We had a piece of broiled monkey the other day for dinner, and laying aside all prejudice, I can not say I found it good. Poultry, especially Turkey, are larger and finer than in the United States. Of fruits we have an inexhaustible profusion and almost endless variety. Bananas and plantains of exquisite flavor, oranges, lemons, sweet and sour, shaddock, red as blood, forbidden fruit, a variety of the orange, cocoanuts, papayas, the sour sop, a most delicious fruit, whose pulp resembles cotton steeped in lomonado, and whose rind is of an olive color, knotted with black like a pine burr, mangoes, zapotes, and ackees are all in season at the present moment.

The latter, whose pulp when fried closely resembles fritters, is delicious and even here a rarity. Plantains and bananas are almost necessities of life, and cost about fifty cents a hundred. Pine apples will soon come in, and are said to equal any in the world. Yams are our substitute for Irish potatoes, and when nicely prepared, can with difficulty be distinguished from their Hibernian relatives. They cost two dollars and twenty-five cents per cwt. We use cocoanut oil for lard. Garden vegetables are indifferent solely on account of the indolence of the inhabitants, for soil and climate alike conspire to foster their growth. Rice of superior quality is abundant. The most expensive items of house-keeping are fuel and washing. For the latter we pay from $1 to $1.50 per dozen, according to the size of pieces. Wood costs 50 cts per 100 sticks, one of which is not so large as a man's arm. The houses are all built without chimneys, and even kitchens have only an orifice for the egress of the smoke. Cooking is done on a large box of earth. Rain water is caught in large iron tanks, which are far more expensive and inferior to the wooden cisterns used in Louisiana. Well water can not be used on account of its brackishness. Merchants have ceased to bring ice into the Colony, as they say it brings them into debt.

The climate is delightful, the sea breeze scarcely stops an hour in the twenty-four, and so cool and bracing is it, that it seems to intoxicate like the foam of champagne. There are but three physicians in the place, and one is an army surgeon, and so healthful is the climate, that none of them have good practice. Land can be had—I mean good land, at 50 cts an acre. Labor, far better than in the U.S., at $12 to $15 per month. Skilled labor however is seldom met with. All their attention has been concentrated on mahogany cutting and all else they must be taught. A single hand can clear about 24 yards square in a day. Small but good mules can be bought for about $50. The horses are mere ponies and there are but two carriages in the Colony. Horned cattle are fine.

Emigrants destitute of capital should not attempt to settle, unless they are content to endure great hardships. I should be loth to try the experiment with less than $6000, but for a robust and energetic man prepared to endure great physical exposure and toil, less would suffice. Good heavy Collins axes are much needed, as the English axe which is used here, is of an inferior quality. A small saw-mill with horse power attached, would likewise be a desideratum, neither would a small cane-mill and kettle for boiling sugar-cane be amiss. Sugar cane grows luxuriantly and the juice is richer by fifty per cent. in saccharine matter than that of Louisiana, but only the rudest machinery is used for making sugar. The same is true with regard to rice which yields abundantly. Cotton matures to a small tree, but is worthless on account of deficiency of staple. Coffee and indigo are capable of being produced to an unlimited extent. The forests still abound with rich furniture and dye woods, but this interest is somewhat languishing on account of recent troubles with the Indians. The wood is all cut away from the water courses, and in penetrating into the interior, the cutters have committed encroachments upon the Indians who have not failed to revenge themselves, and depredations on persons and property have occurred. The government has sent troops who have been victorious and now no apprehensions are felt by thinking men as to the result. There are but few roads in the Colony, all communications being carried on by means of "putpaws" and "dories," which are boats hollowed out of the trunks of large mahogany or cedar trees. Nine tenths of the inhabitants are blacks or mulattoes. Marriage, except among the few foreigners, is only just becoming fashionable. Two or three nights ago one of the richest citizens was married to his bride and on the same occasion their three children were baptized. I have seen and counted not less than twenty shades from pure white to pure black. Many of the ladies and gentlemen of "high color" are educated and accomplished, having been sent to Europe for that purpose. They affect to look down upon their black mammas, who are kept out of sight, when they receive visitors of pure blood. But although they themselves despise the blacks, a disparaging word from whites, is sure to displease them. The whole negro race are far superior in intelligence, courtesy, honesty and industry, to their brethren in the U.S. No feeling of bitterness between the races exists, and insolence among servants is almost unheard of. Law, order and justice prevail as they do wherever the British flag floats. There are no taxes, and a uniform duty on all importations, wines and spirits excepted, of only seven per cent. Consequently all dry goods, and foreign goods of all kinds are cheaper by half than in the U.S.

There are two Catholic, two Episcopal, two Baptist, one Methodist and one Presbyterian Churches. The clergy (except the Catholic) are infected with the Exeter Hall spirit, and Southerners do not attend, as they cannot worship with pleasure where their feelings are constantly liable to be wounded. Please tell Bishop Paine that there is an excellent opening for a pious energetic pioneer preacher of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, in this colony. Messrs Putnam & Cairy, (both Louisianians,) have purchased Ambergris Island and are endeavoring to organize a colony of Southerners. They are reliable. No less than one hundred are expected next fall from Texas. The currency is metallic. American gold is at a premium of 24 per cent fixed by law. Thirty day gold drafts on New York, are the most available funds that emigrants can bring with them. They should not provide themselves with any outfit of clothing, which can be purchased by far cheaper here. They should bring necessary household furniture, books and farming utensils, which can with difficulty be procured.

In conclusion, I have to say that this colony has a virgin soil, resources as yet undeveloped both mineral and agricultural, exemption from taxes, a free and stable government; and that those who are dissatisfied with their homes, and have determined to quit them, provided they are content to endure a few "temporary" inconveniences (among the greatest of which is almost total isolation from congenial society); these I say, will not go far amiss to come to British Honduras.

I am about taking an extended tour into the various States of Central America, and shall let you hear from me from time to time. Please show this letter to Maj. Jonas and Frank Saunders.

Sincerely your friend

MANUEL W. CHAPMAN.

P. S. Whenever I use the terms dollars and cents, I mean gold not currency.

THE LIFE OF TRUST.—We know nothing in "Muller's Life of Trust" more simply beautiful than the following note just received by us from one of the noblest young men in the Southern ministry, to whom, having failed to reach him with corn, owing to the floods, we sent a little money wherewith to provide food till the corn could be shipped:

I rejoiced to learn from your note that the corn had not past Nashville. The prospect of relief from an unexpected source had awakened a hope, the long deferring of which, while, as you say in your note of March 16th, it had greatly annoyed you—had also well nigh made the heart sick with us who had probably depended too much on that promised succor, and not enough upon Him who was first sending it, and then still delaying it.

But mark the faithfulness of our God! We had one-and-a-half bushels of corn and not a dollar to buy more. In private and at the family altar, it had been for days past, and was especially this morning, a part of the burden of our petitions, that God would in some way, as He might please, provide us with "our daily bread." I went to the post-office and got your letter inclosing a draft for $50! His name be praised! His mercy endureth forever! And may He abundantly reward those who have been ministers in this service of Christian sympathy and love.—Christian Commonwealth.

INTERESTING CEREMONY.—It will be seen, by reference to our columns, that Rev. Mr. Carnes, of Galveston, will be inducted, by ordination, into the ministry of the New Church at 11 o'clock to-day (the 14th inst.,) at the New Jerusalem Temple, corner of Bienville and Rampart streets. The ordination service will be performed by the Rev. Mr. Stuart, of New York. The occasion will be one of deep and novel interest in this city, and may be expected to attract numerous visitors to the Temple. The Rev. Mr. Stuart, one of the ordaining ministers of the New Church, has long been well known as a distinguished champion of the doctrines of Divine Revelation, as interpreted by the great Swedish Seer; while Mr. Carnes, formerly a divine of the Methodist Church, has been celebrated for his remarkable powers of persuasion as a pulpit orator.

RICE CULTURE.—When we meet in our travels a man who has planted rice in this country, and has a practical knowledge of the business, we usually get his figures and give them to the public without vouching for the correctness of them.

A short time ago we met a Louisiana planter who gave us his ideas about rice culture in that section of the State. He stated that from four to ten barrels of clean rice can be usually made from an acre of ground, a barrel weighing 280 pounds. Nearly as much rice can be made from irrigated fields as from fields not irrigated. One man can manage fifteen acres of rice not irrigated, or twenty-five acres irrigated. The birds have to be watched, and the rice protected about three weeks before harvest. Rice may be planted late in June, after the over-flow, and make a good crop.—Planter's Banner.

HOUSEKEEPERS' DEPARTMENT.

OLD FASHIONED DOUGHNUTS.—Make up a batch of dough at night, precisely as for bread, only shorten it with about two ounces of clean fat to a pound of flour, and wet with milk instead of water. Then having kneaded in as much active yeast as for ordinary bread, set by in a warm corner, cover over with a towel first, then a blanket, or some warm woolen cloth, and leave to rise through the night. After breakfast, put over the fire a kettle of lard, and while it is heating, the sponge being like a sponge—light, roll out about three-quarters of an inch thick; then cut into slips an inch or so wide. Some of these may be divided into about four-inch sections, leaving them plain. Some may be drawn out and doubled, and twisted into spiral canes, while for the little folks, cut out whales and elephants, knights errant, steamships, and odd-looking, round-bodied Shetland ponies. Sometimes, if you wish to be very old-fashioned, roll out a disc of dough eight or nine inches in diameter, and make the cuts across, not quite to the edge, and then twist the slices, so that the disc looks like a miniature causeway, laid with twisted inch augers made of dough. When the fat is hissing hot—so hot that the dough will absorb more of the grease—begin to fry and hurry it through, being careful to keep up the temperature of the fat to the cooking of the last doughnut.

That's the good, old-fashioned way of making Yankee doughnuts. Nearly three-thirds of all the new, fashionable innovations and substitutes called "crullers" are sweetened, insipid, sticky, greasy abominations—no more to be compared to an honest, raised, shortened, sensible, old-fashioned doughnut, than a choke cherry is to a rich, ripe damson.

RAISIN CAKE.—Two cups of sugar, one cup of butter, or half butter and half fresh lard, three eggs, one cup of molasses, one cup of milk, two and a half teaspoonsful of cream of tartar, one of soda, one pound of raisins, five cups of flour, spice to taste. By putting in plenty of spice and fruit—raisins, currants and citron—this makes a very nice fruit cake, which will keep some time.

An excellent white sauce for fowls may be made of two ounces of butter, two small onions, one carrot, half a small teaspoonful of flour, one pint of new milk, salt and pepper to taste. Cut up the onions and carrot small, and put them into a stewpan with the butter; simmer them till the butter is nearly dried up; then stir in the flour and add the milk; boil the whole gently till it thickens, strain it, season it with salt and cayenne, and it will be ready to serve.

MUSH BISCUIT.—Make about a quart of Indian meal mush, or stir about; while hot, add a piece of butter about the size of an egg; thin it with milk, adding a little salt; then add some flour, thin it with a teaspoon of yeast, then add as much more flour as will make it the consistence of dough; knead it well, set it to rise, and bake with a hot fire. The meal makes the bread light, and thus removes the objection to the unhealthfulness of hot bread.

ABERNETHY BISCUIT.—Dissolve a quarter of a pound of butter in half a pint of warm milk, and with four pounds of fine flour a few carraways, and half a pound of sugar, make a stiff but smooth paste, and to render the biscuit short and light, add half a drachm of carbonate of soda in powder. Roll out very thin; stamp the biscuits, pricking them with a fork; bake in tins in a quick oven.

BUNS.—Three-quarters of a pound of flour, half a pound of sugar, half a pound of butter, half a pound of currants, one ounce of candied peel, quarter of an ounce volatile salts, one nutmeg, two eggs. Cream the butter. Or, one pound of flour, one teaspoonful of baking powder mixed well together; two ounces of lard, sugar, currants or seed to give taste, one egg, a teaspoonful of milk. Make into buns and bake immediately.

EFFECTS OF PEARLASH.—If our friends can in any way teach their wives, daughters, or cooks, to keep the pearl ash out of their bread, all the yellow people, especially the yellow children, who are supposed to be turned yellow by the fever and ague, and bilious fevers, will soon be turned white. It is a great mistake to suppose that the yellow countenances of the West come from bile, when it is the enormous quantity of pearl ash eaten in the bread that is reflected through the skin. Bread is the staff of life, it is said—and so it is—but it is the staff of death, too, in this country. Bad bread kills about as many people here as bad rum. So many people eat poisonous pearl ash for food that they die by inches. Dyspepsia, that great monster disease of the country, that deranges the liver, brings on constiveness, and thus finally kills the human victim, is half the time "pearlash." Here in the East—out of New England—we have driven off the pearl-ash-sakeratus-cooks, but not altogether. Pearl ash lives here yet in bread, but in cities and towns we have nearly whipped out the murderers. In the distant Western towns, beyond the good hotels of the lakes and rivers, Pearl ash, under the name of Sakeratus, is King. It is not any wonder, then, that the people of the East turn yellow West, and sicken, not of fever and ague, bilious and congestive fevers, but of pearl ash three times a day.—Journal of Applied Chemistry.

SCIENTIFIC.

STEAM BOILER.—This invention consists in a novel arrangement of superheating spheres so disposed, as to form a circle above the body of the boiler and within the smoke-box, and so connected and applied as to circulate or pass the steam successively through each sphere. It also consists in a combination of the above with a central or upper steam-drying chamber within the smoke-box and exposed to the draught for supplying said spheres with steam. It further consists in a peculiar arrangement of fire-tubes and combustion-chambers in a vertical boiler operating to throw the heat outward, and whereby the greatest heat is brought to bear against the greatest body of water, so as to check or prevent foaming; likewise it consists, in combination with such arrangement of fire-tubes and combustion-chambers of an upper circular arrangement of superheating spheres, substantially as hereinbefore referred to. R. W. and D. Davis, of Long Island City, N. Y., are the patentees.—American Artizan.

RICE CLEANER.—This invention consists in a peculiarly constructed vertical mill or machine specially adapted for cleaning, pearling, and polishing rice; but also applicable to operating on other kinds of grain, in which machine there are embraced the following features:—First, a combination of stirring pins or teeth, with lower spring-plates or rubbers; second, elastic plates or rubbers secured in a spiral manner on a conical drum or hub, and of a shape in their transverse section approximating an ellipse in part; third, spirally adjustable plates or rubbers so arranged; fourth, the combination of such upper elastic plates with lower ones faced with a soft polishing material; and fifth, in an arrangement whereby air is admitted from beneath and caused to produce a centrifugal current to expel the dust from the grain. D. H. Southworth, of New York City, is the patentee.—American Artizan.

A METALLURGICAL MIRACLE.—Bellani mentions the following very curious experiment:—"If you melt an alloy of tin and lead in a crucible or ladle, and then allow it to get cold, and afterwards write with ordinary ink on the surface of the metal which has been in contact with the sides of the vessel, you may again melt the alloy, and after it has cooled you can still read the letters on the surface! This experiment may be repeated several times and the letters will still be visible, even if the metal has been stirred while melted!" Bellani's explanation of this curious phenomenon is, that a very thin layer of oxyd is formed by the writing, which oxyd is not reduced by the repeated fusing of the metal.—Mechanics Magazine.

DANGEROUS PAPER.—There is a great difference in the combustibility of common paper. Enamelled card paper, on account of its compact body and the presence of mineral matter, white lead or barytes, is quite disinclined to burn; in fact, some kinds are practically fire-proof. White writing and printing paper can seldom be lighted by a spark, and when ignited by a flame it requires dexterity to keep it burning. On the other hand, there is a common reddish yellow paper, which in some circumstances, is as dangerous as gun powder. It takes fire by the smallest spark, and burns like tinder; when once lighted, if left alone, it is sure to be consumed completely. All the yellow and buff paper which I have tested, out of which envelopes are made, partake more or less of the same character. I have no doubt that such paper has been the occasion of some of the fires in this city which have been otherwise unexplained, such as the fires in paper warehouses and offices of professional men. A spark of fire, or the stump of a lighted cigar, falling in a waste basket containing yellow envelopes with other kind of paper, would have a good chance of setting the whole on fire.—Professor Seely.

TO AGENTS.

Our agents will please, whenever practicable, forward money
by draft on Mobile, or New Orleans, payable to our order. We
the monies forwarded to us by
mail but a very small amount has
failed to reach us: whenever the
letters have been registered.

TO SUBSCRIBERS.

Any person wishing to subscribe
for this paper can do so, by paying
the Methodist preacher in the circuit, and forwarding to us his receipt for three dollars, with the
address of the subscriber upon it,
stating Post office, State, Circuit,
and Conference. The receipt
ought to be taken in duplicate.

TO ADVERTISERS.

This paper has for many years
been well known in this community as the very best advertising
medium by which the business
men of the city could bring their
merchandise, trades, professions,
and the like, before country read-
ers. This is easily understood
when it is remembered that the
four hundred preachers who are
scattered throughout these States
in the Rio Grand, East Texas,
Louisiana, Mississippi, Montgom-
ery and Alabama Methodist Conferences, are all, more or less
active agents for the paper; and
when it is also remembered that
our paper circulates among a large
class of people who seldom see
any other New Orleans paper.

THE KING.

The ultimate government of the whole human race will be in the hands of Christ. He is declared to be the One Lawgiver; He is the heir royal of the throne of David, whose throne is to be an everlasting monarchy, extending in its dominion from sea to sea, and
and from the river to the ends of the earth. Such declarations from Heaven, are in themselves enough to insure to Him the Empire Universal, Eternal. No higher right could enhance his claims to the One Kingship. If more were needed it can be found in this, that the human race is His, having been originally modeled upon the Son
in His form as the glorified Son of Man. After the likeness of this image Adam was made; the law of human being and of human development was instituted in him,
to be ultimately realized in a glorified, perfected humanity, and in myriads of glorious sons, that "Christ might be the First-born among many brethren." This original conception, to be realized upon the condition of obedience in Adam, was by Adam checked, and,
so far as his disobedience could do it, defeated. The obedience of another federal Adam, the Obedient Adam, the "Second Adam," restored the broken line, and by Him the original design is again
made possible, and man, by incorruptible generation, through faith,
does once more become a child and an heir of God. We cannot therefore wonder that everything is at last to end in Christ, for all began in him, and from failure all was restored by Him. He is not only the First and the Last but the Central Man. The race immortal lives, and moves, and has its being in Him.

Because all things were by him
and for him, He it was who "laid the measures of the earth" and "stretched the line upon it" in the presence of the "Morning Stars" and the sons of God, amid universal song and shouts of joy.
He walked in Eden and beheld Adam and Eve in the garden as His own offspring. After the great wreck, He remembered Noah and every living thing, and he it was that "blessed Noah and his sons," and said "Behold I establish my covenant with you and with your seed after you." He it was that called Abram out of Chal-
dea, and passed in smoking furnace and burning lamp between the divided "carcasses of the heifer, the
she-goat, the ram, the turtle dove,
and the young pigeon." He accepted Isaac as the type of his own great offering afterward upon the same rocky height. By the bush unwithered in flame He revealed himself to Moses; and from His hand the Jewish Lawgiver received the "fiery law," traced upon unhewn tablets. Forty years long He sustained the vast host of Israel in its marchings through sterile, blackened wastes, where an hourly miracle was demanded
for its support; and with infinite sympathy, and power, he guided and brought them to Canaan. The Prince of Babylon looked into the furnace and saw Him—"Lo, the form of the fourth is like the Son of God." He was heralded by the "Star in the East." He "arose out of Jacob," and to his glory the Magi bore witness. Upon the Cross his name was written. Therefore God has given Him a "name above every name," in heaven and in earth, that at the name of Jesus
every knee should bow.

INTEMPERANCE.

This vice is greatly on the increase. A merchant of Natchi-toches recently said that he stored and forwarded for Planters as many barrels of whiskey as bugs
of corn. At every cross roads
the vilest alcoholic compounds are retailed to the freedmen. And it is quite likely that where there is so much dispensed to the "hands,"

the employer himself often takes a dram. It is full time that good citizens should unite to stem this flood of fire, which threatens our land with disasters, worse, yes, far worse than the horrors of war.
The church should see to it, that the Discipline be enforced against dram-drinkers. Ministers should preach against the physical and social horrors of drunkenness.
Nomatter who the men are, Judges,
'Squires, Colonels, or Doctors, who frequent the grog-shop, they cannot give to it respectability; but they can by example effect the ruin of young men, and fill the homes of their neighbors with wretchedness.
The results of the traffic in whiskey on all the great interests of society may be likened to the valley of vision, a field of skulls and dead men's bones, upon the edges of which one might walk, but their number no man could estimate:
an angel might look at detached portions of it, and form some conception of the dreadful whole.

We do not urge that every one should sign a pledge, but we do urge men of standing to deny themselves for the sake of others. Put away the bottle from the sideboard, if you do not wish to see your son a drunkard. Stop making cordials; and deny yourself a little pleasure that you may save your friend from an untimely grave, O gentle housewife. Do not invite.
O fair maiden, those who live in your smile to taste this wine so innocent at the first, but so fatal in the end. The whole land is getting to be a "field of blood;" refrain for a while that this giant curse
may be averted.

We are pained to see many doble youths and men of mark, who stand high in the records of the brave, yielding themselves to this demon of strong drink. Now they are led captives on the road to shame. Forgetful of their country and their honor, they refuse to encounter the common misfortune,
but seek to steep themselves in forgetfulness. They refuse to affirm forever, by heroic endurance
in defeat, the honesty of those principles for which they once were willing to die. O, let not our land suffer this double death!
Let not the memories and glories of the past expire in the grave of the drunkard!

SUFFERING.

A letter from an esteemed lady says, "There is much distress in this section of country, (West Baton Rouge), also in Gros Tete and Poydrass on account of high water, with great loss of property and life; one man was lost on Poydrass. Thanks to a kind Providence we are still above the water, and at work." The Crescent has an excellent suggestion, that something ought to be done for the unfortunate people who have been driven from their homes by the flood.

"The small quantities of corn and meat which they have been able to save will not suffice for more than a very short time. The cattle and horses which have escaped drowning and been driven to places of temporary safety in the small patches of dry land which still rise above
the wide expanse of water, will soon die of starvation, or succumb to the ravages of disease. The situation of a large portion of our population is certainly distressing in the extreme. We fear that their condition has not been thoroughly appreciated. It is not without reason that an actual famine is feared in the alluvial parishes. We are told that in the parish of Tensas
there are scarcely a dozen dry places, and these are of very small extent. The case is almost as bad in Concordia, Tensas and Madison.
The basin of the Atchafalaya, from Red River to Berwick's Bay, is all under water, and likewise large portions of the country along the Plaquemine and the Lafourche. In all this wide area the people have been driven from their homes, and have lost almost all the supplies of food which they had on hand. The aid thus far rendered by the State,
through the board of levee commissioners, has been very acceptable,
no doubt, and very necessary for present purposes, but entirely insufficient for the main purpose. The first necessity, of course, was to remove the people to a place of safety; and this is, perhaps, all that the means at command of the board can accomplish, and all that they are empowered to grant. It was stated that application would be made to the military authorities to furnish rations to the necessitous

people of the overflowed districts through the freedmen's bureau. We do not know whether or not this application has been successful, but we do know that if something of this kind be not done soon the most calamitous results may ensue."

NEW ADVERTISEMENTS.

We call attention to the following New Advertisements of substantial houses. Our list of new subscribers has been increasing at the rate of seventy a week for the last three months. They are pouring in from Alabama, Mississippi,
and Louisiana—cause unknown.
We suppose the times are so distracted that every one is wishing to see what will become of them;
or the people seek consolation and advise in the columns of a Religious Newspaper. We do not care to know too accurately the philosophy of this increase in our circulation. It may simply be, our preachers are fully at work, and the Advocate comes in for a fair share of their attention. While a portion of the paper must be used for advertising, we try to protect our readers against humbuggery medicinal, mercantile, and other.

THE ORPHAN.

MR. EDITOR—We have recently commenced a school in our Church for the purpose of educating the poor orphan children. And we, the undersigned, ladies of the M. E.
Church, by whose efforts this school has gone into operations, write to apply for any aid that you can afford us. We have thirty pupils.
If you have an Aid Society in your Church, and you think prudent, we would be glad to have you to ask that Society for us (that is, in our name), to aid us in any way. Any thing that you will send us, money, clothing, or any thing, will be thankfully received and properly distributed. This is a Methodist School, and we have all the children in Sabbath School, and by proper management and with other aid we hope to succeed in elevating this class to a better and higher position in life. We have a pious lady at the head of the school, Miss Sarah McCay. We trust you will aid us in any way that you can, and also by your prayers. We feel that it is now an imperative duty devolving upon us to educate the orphans of our country. We will feel under lasting obligations for your help in this affair.

Respectfully and truly,

MARY L. CASSITY, Pres., HANNAH DAVIS, Vice Pres., REBECCA ANASTASIO, Sec.

Tuscaloosa, Ala., April 8, 1867.

We publish the above that it may show what is doing by the good people of Tuscaloosa for the Orphan, and with the hope that it may move our readers to aid so holy an enterprise.

"RISEN WITH CHRIST."

How momentous is the fact, and how interesting are the circumstances of the spiritual resurrection!
Let us consider. The Son of God has tasted death and made salvation possible. The Bible has taught the will of God and the way to Heaven. The Gospel has poured its spirit stirring notes of warning and invitation; and the Holy Spirit has attended and applied these gracious instrumentalities with awakening power.

The man feels that he is a wretch
undone, and cries in the bitterness of his agony—"Oh wretched man
that I am, who shall deliver me from this body of death! God be merciful to me a sinner!"

Satan, who goes about seeking whom he may devour, is at hand to make suggestions, either to damp
the ardor of the penitent's desire,
and lull him into a fatal security,
or else to lead him to despair of salvation. The Church is praying for him and angels are waiting to rejoice over him. How morally imposing is the scene—the hour is big with the destinies of an immortal nature, of endless rapture or everlasting woe. But grace, all sufficient grace triumphs—the penitent self-despairing looks unto Christ, and looking lives—

"Faith lends its realizing light,
The clouds disperse, the shadows fly,
The invisible appears in light,
And God is seen by mortal eye."

Perhaps in a flood of celestial rapture the vision of the pardoning God appears, or it may be in rays as mild and soft as the twilight when morning light appears. Perhaps in tones of loud, sweet harmony
the voice of God seemed to say—
"Go in peace and shine more." Or it may be in a still small voice Jesus whispered "come unto me and I will give you rest." Nor does it matter whether in a moment, as sudden as the lightning flashes
from the cloud, the light of God
flamed down upon the sin-blighted soul, or whether like the gentle march of morning over the eastern hills, the light of life first brightened into day.

Can I say—"Whereas I was blind,
I now see?" It does not matter whether the voice omnipotent said receive thy sight, or whether he anointed my eyes with clay, and bade me go and wash in the pool of Siloam, and I came seeing. I see.
That is the great fact. I have realized a great change. Let me rejoice and not repine because the work of God was not wrought in me as unto another. It is lawful for God to do as he will with his own. Perhaps the time is long past and the scene is afar, but the happy hour is forever hallowed in the blessed memories of the past—
the hour of your espousal of the Saviour's love.

For the N. O. Christian Advocate.

MR. EDITOR: I closed my first round of Quarterly Meetings on the tenth of March. Though the weather has been very unfavorable, we have had some pleasant seasons of Divine favor, a few conversions, and some accessions to the Church. At Greenwood we continued the meeting five days, where quite an interest was manifested. Six persons united with the Church, and could
the meeting have been continued longer, others, doubtless, would have enrolled their names with the church militant. We had an interesting occasion at Yazoo city, with three accessions.

The condition of the country is such, that it is impracticable to protract the Quarterly Meetings, at this season of the year, except in the towns; and the unfavorable weather has hindered us in doing that, except in one or two instances.
But with all the discouragements,
we have abundant reasons to thank God for blessings experienced, and the consolations afforded by the promises of His word. The vista of the future is illumined by the light of hope and the assurances of the gospel; and we look forward to more prosperous times, when outward circumstances will be more propitious.

The Advocate is highly commen-ed in its improved condition, be-
as to typography and matter, it stands among our best church pubnals. I am surprised that it should be thought "too weighty," that one of its excellencies. I hope will continue to be weighty in importance, and powerful to the overcoming of error in every form. I would pleased to see more on Roman schools, either from yourself or your correspondent W. Many Protestants are sending their children to Roman Catholic schools, and very dis-
they give as reasons, that they more thorough in instruction, and cheaper schools; both of which think erroneous. Please venturthis subject thoroughly, as you have it upon the tapis. The Romans are endeavoring to get possession of all the vacant schools and colleges, occupying as far as possible
the ground once cultivated by Protestants.

We must be watchful, energetic and zealous for the truths of a Christianity, or we must relinquish
the field.

A HARD HIT.

Northern religion is beginning to reap some of the fruit of its sowing for some years past. Mr. Ruskin

POLITICAL NEWS.

WASHINGTON, April 15.—In the Supreme Court to-day Chief Justice Chase delivered an opinion in the case of the State of Mississippi and Gen. Ord and others, on the motion for leave to file a bill restraining them from the execution of the reconstruction act. The court dissented from the argument of the counsel, that the President is required merely to perform a ministerial act, and held that the terms ministerial and executive are by no means equivalent in import. A ministerial duty, the performance of which may in proper cases be required by judicial process, is one in which nothing is left to discretion. On the other hand it is the duty of the President to see that the laws are faithfully executed, and among those laws is the reconstruction act.

An attempt on the part of the judicial department to enjoin the performance of these duties by the President might justly be characterized, in the language of Chief Justice Marshall, as an absurd exercise of power.

Congress is the legislative department of the Government, the President the Executive department. Neither can be restrained in its action by the judicial department, though the acts of both when performed, are in proper cases subject to its cognizance.

The court proceeded to show the impropriety of such interference by considering the probable consequences, and concluded as follows: "It has been suggested that the bill contains a prayer that if the relief sought for cannot be obtained against Andrew Johnson as President, it may be granted against him as a citizen of Tennessee; but it is plain that relief against the execution of an act of Congress by Andrew Johnson is relief against its execution by the President. A bill praying for an injunction against the execution of an act of Congress by the incumbent of the Presidential office, cannot be received, whether it describes him as President, or simply as a citizen of a State. The motion for leave to file the bill is, therefore, denied."

In the case of the State of Georgia against certain officers, the Attorney General makes no objection to the policy of the bill, and we will therefore grant leave to file the bill.

Judge Sharkey said the objection to the bill he attempted to file, seemed to be that it was an effort to enjoin the President. The bill was not filed, and he could reform it to suit the views of the court, and present it again. Chief Justice Chase replied, "leave to file the bill is refused—when another bill is presented, it will be considered."

Sharkey. "I understand the Court to say that application can be made on Thursday?"

Chief Justice Chase replied, "On Thursday."

Thus ended, for the present, proceedings in the Court. Subsequently a subpoena was ordered to be issued against Gen. Pope, commanding in Georgia, according to the rule of the Court. The process is to be served on the defendants sixty days before the return of the process, and as the Court will adjourn in May, the return day in this case cannot be until in December.

THE WAY IT RUNS.—We clip the following from the N. O. Times.

The instances of rejections by the registrars reported to us, in entire disregard of the acts of Congress, are so numerous that we have not space to notice a tithe of them. The registrars appear to have adopted rules of their own, which have no authority in law or reason, and can only be assigned to ignorance, caprice or partisan rancor. Some of our best citizens, who come clearly within the provisions of the act of Congress as good voters, have been turned away by men who are strangers to the great mass of our people, and are of doubtful qualifications as voters. They receive their instructions from the secret clubs, of the Radicals, and treat with scorn and contempt the act of the Congress of the United States.

Even the oath prescribed in the registration act has been varied and changed by them in a material manner. The so-called supporters of the Union and lovers of law lead off in the most palpable and flagrant violations of law. The following rejections call for special notice:

Dr. M. M. Dowler, one of the oldest and most respected physicians in this city, who has not been absent from the city for thirty years, who never held an office in the Federal, State or city government, and who was never engaged in the rebellion, found it impossible to get registered in the Fourth District, where he voted before the registrar who questioned him so rigidly, was born.

Mr. De Armas, the Deputy Sheriff, so well known to all classes of our citizens for his integrity and fidelity who was born in the city, and has voted regularly for thirty years in the district in which he was born, and was never engaged in the rebellion, was rejected in the Third District.

Col. Von Zinken, who was naturalized after the war, was rejected for acts done before he became a citizen.

LATEST NEWS.

MOBILE, April 18.—A large meeting of negroes was held here last night, at which 3000 persons were present. Inflammatory speeches were made by black and white speakers. Resolutions were adopted, affiliating with the radical party, demanding the right to sit on juries, to hold office, and ride on the street cars. The meeting adjourned at a late hour.

Most of the colored persons present were armed, and a great number of shots were fired in the air after adjournment.

Cotton.—Sales 350; market dull; middlings 24c; receipts 51 bales.

COLUMBIA, S. C., April 18.—The governor estimates that 100,000 people of South Carolina have not tasted meat for thirty days. The destitution is great, several cases of starvation reported.

Registration of voters will commence as soon as a sufficient number of persons report themselves qualified to act as registers, but few have done so yet.

WASHINGTON, April 19.—I have seen Attorney General Stanbury's opinion, defining the disfranchisement clause. It is clear and explicit, and will be entirely satisfactory to the people. You may expect it in a few days.

New York, April 19.—It has transpired here that the summons to Messrs. Frazer, Trenholm & Co. to appear before the Judiciary impeachment committee was based on allegations that a million dollars in gold had been paid to secure the pardon of the blockade runners.

New York, April 19.—Gold and Stock Brokers assembled on the street in considerable numbers. Gold opened with sales at 138 1/2 to 138 3/4, but afterwards fell to 137 1/2 to 137 3/4.

At noon it was 138. Flour steady. Wheat quiet, without decided change; receipts none. Corn a shade firmer; receipts none.

Pork heavy; new mess $22.50 to $22.90. Cotton heavy, unsettled and nominal. Freights dull.

BALTIMORE, April 18.—Archbishop Spalding reported beyond recovery.

BERLIN, April 19.—It is reported that Napoleon is strengthening his forces and military posts on the frontier, placing his artillery on a war footing, purchasing ambulances; and that the French Reserves of 1868 will be called out on 1st of May.

It is represented that Prussia also is making active military preparations.

LONDON, April 19.—No further demand has been made upon Spain in the case of the steamer Tornado, which still remains unsettled.

LONDON, April 19.—Dispatches received from Berlin state that the speech of King William on closing Parliament, excites distrust throughout Germany.

PARIS, April 19.—Bourse dull and heavy. Rentes declined one franc.

LIVERPOOL, April 19.—To day, Good Friday, no markets or stock boards.

FOREIGN ITEMS.

The ship Deutschland, from Southampton, arrived at New York on the 13th instant, with highly important intelligence of which the following is an abstract:

The Paris correspondent of the Standard says the feeling is unanimous that the French government stands committed to a step, as regards Luxembourg, which, while it fails to allay the apprehension and irritation caused by Prussia, is regarded as likely to precipitate a European war.

The official gazette of Holland positively denies that the Duchy has been ceded to France, and adds that there can only be a question of such a cession, if the Great Powers who are interested have first come to an understanding on the subject.

A telegram from Luxembourg says that hand-bills were circulated in town in favor of annexation to France, and instigating the inhabitants to acts of violence against Prussia.

Four regiments of Nassauers who garrison the fortress have attempted revolt.

BERLIN, April 1.—Herr Von Bismarck's motion was put to-day. Bismarck said: "We wish for peace, but will not shrink from war, if it be necessary to repel the very first attempt of France to attack our honor. Let us give a speedy and resolute answer to the warlike tendencies of France, and we shall stifle them in the bud."

Bismarck, in his reply, said the Prussian Government did not know that an arrangement for the cession of the Duchy had been concluded between Holland and France, but the federal allied Governments believe that no foreign power will endanger the undisputed right of Germany. They hope to protect these rights more safely by peaceful means, and preserve good relations with foreign powers, the more the debates in Parliaments shall show the indissoluble ties that exist between the Government and people.

A rumor is prevalent in Vienna that preliminaries to an alliance have been agreed upon between Prussia and Austria. The official gazette denies this in toto.

A new bill was introduced in the Hungarian Parliament for recruiting the army.

The Vienna correspondent of the Bank Gazette says the Austrian Ambassador at Berlin has been instructed to declare to the Prussian Government that in the hour of danger Austria will stand by Germany. It is thought the object of the visit of the Crown Prince of Saxony to Berlin was to announce the military course of Saxony organized as Federal troops.

The London News of the 2d says, editorially, that Russian America has been acquired by its natural purchasers—a great progressive Power, of whose advances we cannot complain so long as they are achieved by legitimate means.

The Times of the 2d says editorially, on the same subject: "Since we have no right to protest against an act entirely within the discretion of the Russian and United States Governments, let us not place ourselves in a false position by vain remonstrances. Let us forbear to fasten upon this unexpected transaction a hostile construction, or to insist upon rights and interests which are incapable of being maintained."

Armed Peace.

The Belgian War Office, having instituted an inquiry respecting the armaments which are going on in Europe, the following information has been obtained:

FRANCE.—Four hundred and eighty thousand Chassepot rifles are in course of manufacture, the greatest portion to be finished before the 1st of March, 1868.

PRUSSIA.—The needle gun and rifle cannon system to be maintained. The gun manufacturers are very busy in completing the stores for the arsenals. One million and one hundred thousand breech-loading steel barrels have been ordered since the war.

AUSTRIA.—The alteration of 500,000 guns on the Wauzl principle; 300,000 to be completed by the end of the year.

SOUTH GERMANY.—Bavaria, Wurttemberg, Baden and Hesse-Darmstadt adopt the breech-loading gun, on the understanding that the system may be changed if the experiments which are going on at Munich are not found to be satisfactory. The Prussian rifle cannon is preferred, and large orders are in course of execution.

ENGLAND.—One hundred and fifty thousand Enfield rifles are already converted on the Snider principle. Three hundred and fifty thousand guns of the same kind will be ready in the course of the year. One thousand guns are being converted every day in the government manufacturing. Four hundred and twenty-six rifle cannons of various calibres will be manufactured by the end of the year.

RUSSIA.—Six hundred thousand guns are being converted on the Carle principle (a modification of the needle-gun). Three hundred thousand will be ready by the beginning of next year. Nine hundred breech-loading cannons are in course of construction to complete the field-batteries.

DENMARK.—The Chambers have voted a large sum for the conversion of the present guns into breech-loaders, but the model gun has not yet been decided upon.

HOLLAND.—The conversion of the present arm into guns on the Snider principle.

ITALY, SPAIN, PORTUGAL, GREECE.—The breech-loading gun adopted. Spain and Greece have ordered cannon from the manufactory of M. Krupp, of Essen, in Prussia.

Belgium will continue the use of the rifle Prussian cannons adopted in 1864, and will bring into use the breech-loading small arm.

SAMS, MONKEY.

This is the title of a long article in a late number of "The Young Folks." Sam was himself a rather bad boy, but his monkey was worse.

Here is a partial list of his pranks: You know, when you left, the creature was quite shy and still, and would hardly move or eat. In the morning he still seemed so harmless and depressed that I allowed Sam to leave him unchained when he went to school, thinking he would feel more at home if he walked about a little. Accordingly he did walk about, but very slowly and shyly. He seemed to take a fancy to Roxy, and, though she hated him, followed her about closely while she gave Dora her bath, and afterward washed some laces in the bath-room basin. His aspect was so comically wise and attentive that we all laughed, and felt more kindly toward him.

By and by I went down stairs, leaving him asleep in a patch of sunlight on the play-room floor, while Roxy and Dora were sitting, as usual, in the nursery close by. I had hardly been down half an hour when piercing screams from Dora made me run up again. O such a scene! The perfidious monkey, in imitation of Roxy's performances, had collected all the dolls from the baby-house, thrown them into the bath-tub, and turned on the water, besides putting to soak in the basin a pile of Dora's freshly-ironed white aprons, which Roxy had left a moment on a chair. Poor Dora's grief, as she pulled her drenched dollies out of their bath, was extreme. The china ones were unhurt, except as to their dresses; but the large painted one was a melancholy spectacle; the black of her hair and the red of her cheeks ran all over her face, and ruined her white frock. I could think of nothing but a savage in his war-paint; while the favorite wax lady, with real hair, was painfully like a drowned kitten. Roxy's wrath was loud and long. The monkey fled before it, and did not re-appear till dinner-time.

I'm sorry to say that Sam only laughed till he cried when he heard of the ruin Jocko had wrought. But before night he realized that mischief was not always so amusing. I allowed him to take the monkey out for a walk, on condition he did not loose him or allow him out of his sight for a moment. For a while all went well. Jocko made plenty of sport, pelting the boys with acorns, riding on Ponto, etc.; but at last they grew tired of him, chained him to the fence, and amused themselves by skipping stones on the surface of the pond. Presently Mr. Monkey began to imitate them; and, though his stones did not skip, he threw them so fast and made such ludicrous imitations of the positions and gestures of the boys, that they screamed with laughter and encouraged his play.

Suddenly some one cried, "He gets his stones out of your pocket, Sam! O my eyes! they're your marbles!" Too true! Sam had carelessly flung his overcoat on the fence, and Jocko, smelling the ginger-bread in the pockets, had explored them all, discovered the marbles, and made rapid use of them. Alas! the beautiful Chinese ones, the gorgeous glass ones, the agates, the alabasters, and the common ones, were all deep in the middle of the pond. Poor Sam! he gave way, forgot his manliness, and cried as bitterly as Dora had over her drowned dollies. Jocko received a good whipping, and was chained up for the night, with nothing but dry bread for his supper.

Poor Sam was somewhat consoled the next morning; for kind Annie gave him fifteen cents out of her own pocket-money to buy new marbles. On the strength of this, he forgave Jocko, and fed him generously before he went to school. I decided that the mischievous creature must remain tied; but Sam made such eloquent representations of the harshness of solitary confinement in the woodshed that I commuted the sentence to a short rope under the kitchen table.

Going down there in the course of the morning, I found Biddy cutting up fish for a chowder. She solemnly informed me that the monkey watched her so closely that she was getting quite nervous. "The wise-like look of the baste is something awful, marm; he sees every turn of my hand; and it's all of a creep I am, with his stiddy watchin' and uivor spakin' for it's my belaf he could spake if he chose."

I laughed at her, gave my directions for dessert, and was leaving the room, when she called my attention to the cellar door. The latch was out of order in some way, so that to keep the door closed she was obliged to bolt it. She dropped her knife as she turned to show me, but neglected to pick it up till we had examined and discussed the broken latch. Promising to have it mended I went away, and she, stooping for the knife, noticed with relief—as she told me afterward—that Jocko had curled himself up, and gone to sleep. Alas, poor Biddy! she little knew that, while she was so volubly explaining the state of the door, the wily creature had not only noticed that, but had used the knife to cut his rope, and was only waiting for a good opportunity to make use of his liberty. His time soon came. Biddy went down cellar, and her apparently sleeping enemy instantly started up, closed and bolted the door upon her, and, with joyful chattering, found himself master of the kitchen.

His first exploit was a thorough foraging of the pantry. Here he ate out the middle of two pies, consumed several cup-custards, emptied the sugar-bowl upon the floor, the better to select the big lumps, and threw the salt-cellar through the window, because he did not relish its contents. He next directed his inventive mind to the cooking, quite regardless of the scolding of his prisoner, who was now wildly beating on the cellar door. Having previously watched her putting the various ingredients into the chowder, he now decided to add a few of his own selection. With this in view, he pulled open the table-drawer, and finding there a pleasing variety of objects, he proceeded by the aid of a chair and a towel to reach and remove the cover of the kettle without burning his wicked paws, and with wonderful swiftness he then added the whole contents of the drawer to poor Biddy's savory stew.

What his next achievement would have been we can never know, for at this moment Roxy was heard coming down stairs to re-iron the white dresses rudely treated the day before. Jocko dropped on the cover, towel and all, and ran to hide himself behind the flour barrel in the pantry, and Roxy coming in saw nothing amiss; but poor Biddy's cries were distinctly audible, and in great amazement she hastened to open the door, and was instantly overwhelmed with bitter reproaches from the furious prisoner, who, of course, regarded nurse as the sole author of the joke. It was only after the exchange of a great many loud words, and the copious shedding of tears on cook's part, that they came to an understanding, and finally—missing Jocko—to the right conclusion.

Of course he was no where to be found, and peace was at last restored but not to continue long; for Biddy going to the closet, discovered the dreadful signs of invasion there, and set up a yell worthy of a wake. Roxy, at the same moment, stooping over the range for a flat-iron, perceived an unaccountable odor, lifted the cover of the chowder-kettle, and immediately sat flat down upon the floor and gave way to screams of dismay and laughter. The noise of this duet reached even to the nursery, and Dora and I hurried down, expecting to find the house on fire at least. O Max! If you could only have been here! I have not laughed so since we were children, and that bottle of beer burst, and blew off grand-father's wig. Roxy still sat on the floor, lame and weak with hysterical laughing and crying, but not quite able to subdue either; Biddy with her apron over her head, alternately bewailed "the poor dear doctor's dinner spoiled, and he niver mistrustin'," and threatened Jocko with every form of violent death.

The state of the pantry was nothing compared to that chowder. There, all boiling and steaming together, were slices of pork and rusty hair-pins, flakes of fish and a ball of lamp-wicking, rounds of potato, a half-knitted stocking, bits of onion, spoons of cotton, and a big lump of beeswax, a half eaten apple, a pocket-comb, and a fancy fan, the "Key of Heaven" reduced to the consistency of the hard crackers, a lump of flag-root, and two or three neck-ribbons floating on top. Such a time as we had, fishing all these out! But you can imagine the rest—how I scolded the girls into self-command, and set them to preparing a new dinner—how the Doctor not having his regular Friday's chowder, forgot what day it was and missed an important appointment—and how Jocko crept out at nightfall and received a suitable compensation for his tricks.

All day Saturday he languished in chains, and, though the children invited their friends to see him, I would not allow him to be loosed.

A GOOD RECOMMENDATION.—"Please, sir, don't you want a cabin-boy?" "I do want a cabin-boy, my lad, but what's that to you? A little chap like you ain't fit for the berth."

"Oh, sir, I'm real strong! I can do a great deal of work, if I ain't so very old."

"But what are you here for? You don't look like a city boy. Run away from home, eh?"

"Oh, no indeed sir! My father died, and my mother is very poor, and I want to do something to help her. So she let me come."

"Well, sonny, where are your letters of recommendation? Can't take any boy without those."

Here was a dumper. Willie had never thought of its being necessary to have letters from his minister or his teacher, or from some proper person, to prove to strangers that he was an honest and good boy. Now what should he do? He stood in deep thought; the captain meanwhile earnestly watching the workings of his expressive face. At length he put his hand into his bosom and drew out his little Bible, and with one word put it into the captain's hand. The captain opened to the blank page, and read:

"Willie Graham. Presented as a reward for regular and punctual attendance at Sabbath school, and for his blameless conduct there and elsewhere. From his Sunday-school teacher."

Captain McLeod was not a pious man; but he could not consider the case before him with a heart unmoved. The little fatherless child, standing humbly before him, referring him to the testimony of his Sunday-school teacher, as it was given in his little Bible, touched a tender spot in the breast of the noble seaman, and clapping Willie heartily on the shoulder, he said:

"You are the boy for me; you shall sail with me; and if you are as good a lad as I think you are, your pockets shall be empty when you go back to your good mother."—Melthorpe Home Journal.

FARM AND GARDEN.

Does the Soil Need Rest?—Our fathers in Agriculture quite generally held the opinion that summer-fallowing greatly benefited the soil by the rest it gave. If the land lay utterly idle through all the season of growth, should it not recuperate its powers of production? They believed it would. And this opinion prevails to some extent at the present time among farmers.

But absolute rest adds nothing to the soil; no food for plants descends from the air above or rises from the sub-soil below. No favorable chemical action is known to be induced by exposing a naked soil a long time to the elements; on the contrary it may be apprehended that the washing of the rain, the parching of the sun, the evaporation of the atmosphere, remove some of the volatile substances which are found in a fertile soil. Rest does not impart fertility to the sands of the desert, nor arable soils in a state of nature where they are increasing in fertility, ever permitted to be destitute of vegetable covering.

The soil then does not need rest—requires cultivation. By cultivation we mean here those physical changes which may be made. It wants deep and thorough working, so that the roots of plants can reach every particle of soil; it needs draining, to draw off the stagnant water which is poison to the roots of our cereals and cultivated grasses. Deep, thorough and frequent pulverization of the soil, though it adds nothing to the amount of plant food, will, by making it all available to the crops, cause the land to be very productive. Then, except during the brief period of this thorough working, the soil should be producing, for it is by the sole agency of what grows upon it that the farmer can hope to increase the amount of plant food in his land.

But is not land constantly producing crops, whether of grain or grass, exhausting itself? Yes; if those crops are removed from the soil, and no remuneration made therefor; but if the whole produce of the ground is returned to it the amount of plant food is increased. The soil becomes richer for the reason that the substance of the plant was only partly derived from the soil, but largely from the atmosphere, and while the soil receives again what it gave, through the decomposition of the plant, it has in addition all that was drawn from other sources. This is the reason why the plowing under of clover, or other green crops, for manure, enriches the soil. The crops have drawn only part of their fertilizing components from the soil—they have gathered from the air likewise—and it is precisely this which increases the previous richness of the soil. And if all the manure which crops will make by passing through the animal system be returned to the soil, its fertility will doubtless be maintained; enough will be returned to replace the ash-constituents of the plant, which alone were derived from the earth.

We conclude, then, that the soil does not need rest to render it fertile. It needs cultivation and cropping, not reckless, wasteful, unmethodical farming, but that so planned and executed as to grow large and varied crops, and dispose of them in such manner as to return the extracted elements of fertility to the soil.—Rural New Yorker.

DISSOLVING BONDS.—Bonds dissolved, or reduced by any process, are one of the best manures, and every farmer can save and dissolve

a great many each year if he will only set about it in the following manner: Get a large cask or box—a sugar hogshead is as good as any thing—set it out where it will catch all the rain that falls, and into this throw your bones and ashes as fast as you can make them; the ashes should be the greater bulk, so that the bones will be completely imbedded in the ashes. The rains will keep the mass moist, and the lye will act on the bones, and completely dissolve them in from six to twelve months. Should there not be enough rain fall to thoroughly moisten the whole mass, chamber lye should be added, or water sufficient poured on to make up the deficiency. There should be two casks or boxes, so that when the one is full it may stand while the other is being filled, and in the meantime the bones become thoroughly dissolved. Some say that a little caustic lime added to the ashes, helps to dissolve the bones faster. This I have not tried, but the former I have, and know it to be a good thing, and would advise all to save and prepare the bones on their farms in this simple, easy and inexpensive way.—E. A. Richl, in Farmer's Advocate.

THE RANGE OF BEES' FLIGHT.—This is a subject of great importance to bee keepers, as it has been supposed that bees fly only about three (3) miles when collecting honey, consequently there was a fear lest the apiary might be overstocked.

Having ascertained that there was no bees on Kelley's Island (Lake Erie), in the spring of 1866, we established an apiary of the Italians there, for the purpose of rearing more Italian queens, and ascertaining the flight of the Italians for food. In less than a week after they commenced flying there, they were at work on the opposite end of the Island, more than five (5) miles from their hives. This season we shall carry some of the Italians out on the water, in a bee hunting box, and ascertain just how far they will work to and from the hives for feed. We are of the opinion, however, that they will not work as far on the water as on the land, where there is a continuous supply of flowers to lead them off from the apiary. We will report further at the close of the season.—W. A. Flanders & Co., in American Farmer.

TAMING BEES.—The whole art of "taming bees" is embodied in the following: 1. A honey bee filled with "liquid sweets" will not sting of its own accord. 2. Bees, when frightened, will generally fill themselves with honey, and if given liquid sweets will invariably accept them. Bees may be frightened thus: 1. By blowing upon them the smoke of spunk, tobacco, or cotton rags. 2. By confining them to the hive and rapping the sides of it lightly with a small stick. At first, they will try to get out, but finding that impossible they will then rush to their stores and fill themselves with honey.

HAVE YOU A GARDEN SPOT?—It should be a choice piece of land; not large, but rich, dry, warm, near the dwelling, and enclosed to prevent the depredations of fowls and animals. If the soil is poor you have the means at hand to make it rich; if heavy or wet, thoroughly underdrain it—as it is small you can afford this expense. We repeat, it need not be large, for a small garden, well tilled, is much better, and less costly, than a large one overrun with weeds, and cultivated like your fields. Leaf mould from the woods, with ashes, lime and plaster, are the best manures you can use, unless you can spare or plough in deep fine barnyard manure. This year you should make a compost heap, and have it on hand for the next.

If the garden is small, it is best not to plough, but rather spade.—First of all lay it out well; make a bed or border, as they are called, four or five feet wide, all round the outside. Next to this a walk; then one or two broad cross-walks, and reserve the rest for beds and walks, as crops and circumstances shall dictate. Make up your mind now to have a good garden this year; and in our next article we will try and tell you how to start the early vegetables and seed in a cheap and simple manner.—Rural New Yorker.

MULCHING SMALL FRUITS.—The Horticultural Association of Western Michigan recommends the mulching of small fruits for the following reasons:—1st, it affords protection against winter killing; 2nd, it serves as an artificial retainer of moisture, which in most seasons is advantageous to the growth and perfection of fruit; 3d, it may be useful as a fertilizer; 4th, it assists in keeping down grass and weeds; 5th, fruit well mulched is always clean.

An adulterous sense crosseth the verity of scripture, as much as does the corruption of the text.

DUPLEX ELLIPTICAL SKIRT!
[Or, Double Spring]

THEY WILL NOT BEND OR BREAK
Like the Single Spring, but will preserve their perfect and graceful shape when three or four ordinary skirts are thrown aside as useless—these are the CHEAPEST.

Each Hoop is made by braiding two springs together, edge to edge, forming the STRONGEST, most FLEXIBLE, and still the LIGHTEST Hoop made.
In fact, for promenade, or the house, or the church, the theatre, or for crowded assemblies, railroad cars, carriages, etc., they are superior to all others, affording COMFORT TO THE WEARER, with that ELEGANCE OF SHAPE which was favor with all, and has made the "DUPLEX ELLIPTIC"

The Standard Skirt of the Fashionable World.
For ladies and young ladies they are superior to all others.

For Sale Everywhere.

Manufactured exclusively by the owners of the Patent.

WEST, BRADLEY & CARY,
47 Chambers, 79 and 81 Beade Sts., New York.

CAUTION.

The Duplex Skirt will admit a pin being run through the centre of each hoop, thereby proving there are TWO SPRINGS braided together, which is the secret of their remarkable STRENGTH and FLEXIBILITY—a combination not possessed by any SINGLE SPRING Skirt.
The red ink stamp, viz: "J. W. BRADLEY'S Duplex Elliptic Skirt," will be found upon the waistband of every skirt; none other are genuine.

For a full and complete description of the Duplex Skirt, see the Christian Advocate, April 20, 1867.

RANDOLPH MACON COLLEGE, VA.
IN FULL OPERATION.
THIS TIME HONORED INSTITUTION IS once more in successful operation, with a FULL CORPS OF PROFESSORS. The chairs of the several schools are filled by able and experienced men. There are five literary and scientific schools, viz: OF ANCIENT LANGUAGES, CHEMISTRY and NATURAL PHILOSOPHY, MORAL PHILOSOPHY and MODERN LANGUAGES. In addition to the above the Board of Trustees have established a school of COMMERCIAL SCIENCE, with the view of giving to the young men of the country a BUSINESS EDUCATION.

To graduates in all these schools, Diplomas are granted, and the degrees of Bachelor of Arts and Master of Arts are conferred upon students who accomplish a certain course. The high grade of scholarship formerly required is still maintained. We have a full CHEMICAL and PHILOSOPHICAL APPARATUS for the illustration of the subjects taught.

The location of the College is unsurpassed for health and geniality. It is situated midway between the mountains and the seaboard; and during a career of thirty-three years, and with thousands of young men in attendance, there has never been a death arising from malaria or other local cause. We profess to educate young men not only mentally but physically also.

BOARD OF SIXTEEN DOLLARS PER MONTH. Tuition from $40 to $60, according to the number of schools attended. $250 will cover expenses of board, tickets for three schools, matriculation and contingent fees for ten months. Rooms in the college free of charge, but the student provides his own furniture, fuel and lights. Young men who are preparing for the ministry and those disabled by the late war who are unable to pay their tuition, will be allowed to attend any or all of the schools free of charge.

This College is situated near Boydton, the county seat of Mecklenburg county, Va.

Arrangements are made to transport students from Railway Depot, on the Raleigh and Weldon Railroad, whilst a conveyance leaves Boydton station, on the Richmond and Danville Railroad, on Mondays, Wednesdays and Fridays, and the West Point Depot, on the same road, Tuesdays, Thursdays and Saturdays.

We solicit a liberal patronage from Maryland, Virginia and North Carolina, from the West, South and South west.

Students will be received at any time. The second term will commence on the 15th day of February next. Young men will be received and prepared for the College proper. For further particulars address the undersigned at Boydton, Mecklenburg county, Va.

NEW ORLEANS MARKETS.

From the N. O. Price Current.

We have again to notice a very quiet market in our leading staple have been restricted by the tenor of the foreign news and disagreement between parties with regard to prices; the sales of Sugar and Molasses have been confined to retail transactions; and the movement in Western Produce has shown but little animation.

COTTON.—On Friday last operations were nearly suspended by the tenor of the foreign news, and we were compelled to omit all quotations, but that the previous business had been on the basis of 27 for Low Middling, and 28 to 28½ for Middling. On Saturday the movement continued on the most limited scale, the sales being but 1200 bales, while the prices paid exhibited so much irregularity that they could hardly serve as a basis for regular quotations. On Monday the business was confined to 2200 bales, prices exhibiting the same irregularity noticed on the preceding day. Tuesday the sales, which comprised 2250 bales, were at figures indicating a decline since last Thursday of ½¢ to 1¢ per pound.

The receipts proper since Friday evening comprise 4847 bales, against 6449 during the corresponding period last week, showing a decrease of 1602 bales.

The receipts at this port, since the 1st of September, (exclusive of the arrivals from Mobile, Florida and Texas), are 646,247 bales, against 599,130 bales to same date last year, and the decrease in the receipts at all the ports, up to the latest date, as compared with last year, is 125,643 bales. In the exports from the United States to foreign countries, as compared with the same dates last year, there is a decrease of 58,215 bales to Great Britain, of 42,392 to France, and an increase of 32,391 bales to other foreign ports.

Monetary.

FRIDAY, April 19, 1867.

There was an uneasy feeling prevailing among the frequenters and habitues of Carondelet street yesterday. The telegraph commenced operations at the usual hour. From 11 to 3 o'clock there were about many anxious inquiries for later advices from the other side of the Atlantic as they have been known for some time past. Yes, throwing out the war events of 1861, we have not observed so much feeling, not altogether a panic, but an excitement, since October, 1857. What causes this excitement, what is the matter, as many parties inquire?

The advance in gold after the 10 o'clock quotations, which were 133½, to 137½ to 137 7-8, created a great sensation, though it was late in the day. It was suggested that the shorts and bears in New York had been cornered. Attending this advance in gold was an unexpected decline in cotton in Liverpool, 11 3-8d. was the figure at 2 o'clock, while 5-20s were well maintained, being quoted at 71½ ex-dividend of 3 per cent.

Foreign exchange higher, owing to the decline in cotton. Prime bankers' sterling 109 3-8 to 109½. Gold excited by reports of another decline in cotton, and a rumor that negotiations had been broken off between Prussia and France. Closed at 137 to 137½. Governments firm and moderately active. Stocks a fraction better at the close.—Times.

A SERMON ON EXCUSES.

For the N. O. Christian Advocate.
I pray thee have me excused. Mark v. 18.
The section from which the text is taken, gives several examples of the readiness of the mind to find suitable excuses for postponing duties towards which there is a lack of inclination. It shows also, that the Lord is not conciliated by such a treatment of his claims. Among members of the church, the disposition to neglect duty, and to be content with a bare apology, has become so prevalent, as to entitle it to a more serious aspect, and it imports a sensible decline, of interest in the success of Christian principles. It brings into question the integrity of Christian character, and it disputes the testimony so ably borne to the paramount importance of the Christian calling. These are evils of sufficient magnitude to startle the most forbearant, and enable all to see the immense burden imposed upon a struggling church by its delinquent members. Leaving the cases illustrated in connection with the text, we shall confine our observations to those excuses we encounter in our pastoral visitations.

The slight difference in the two cases will not create an incongruity in the use of the text. Those sought to be excused from a commitment to the gospel. These from duties consequent upon a profession of faith. These cases are brought together to afford a striking view.

1. Of the inconsistency in a profession of faith, with a desire to be excused from duty.

The uniform plea is inability. Those in the Scripture plead want of time; to their we must add two more for our brethren, "poverty" and "hard times." We shall weigh these.

1. Poverty, because the force of this excuse is felt, rather than understood. It is used by so many, it is thought to ward off every reproach, and afford a safe protection from the imposition of the cross in the scheme of Christian duty. A refuge so easy of access is likely to tempt many to take advantage of it; to plead poverty when the amount of their possessions do not really justify it. By so doing, they unwittingly counteract the guilt of falsehood, and have to answer for that, as well as for pride which is the essence of the excuse. The item of dress and personal appearance, constitutes one part of the difficulty, and disinclination to the other. There are certain traits in this species of pride, as singular as they are contradictory. Poverty, under this view is carried to the highest pitch of excellence. Its virtue is made to stand in lieu of obedience, and its merit is so great as to render superfluous the use of the means of grace. And yet, again, it is depicted as a great curse, a calamity so obvious as to justify the most exacting claims upon the attention and sympathy of others, but the Savior whose eye was quick to detect virtue, however humble its form, and never allowed merit to miss a reward, saw no such virtue or merit in poverty, neither did he see in it a calamity to be shunned, or more obnoxious to the exercise of Christian dispositions, than could be easily overcome. Such a restriction of the sphere of duty, in cases of actual poverty, is chargeable also with inconsistency, since it makes of no reputes the chief excellence of the gospel, the binding obligation to preach it to the poor. Is it to be the poor are unable to meet the requirements of the gospel? Why then, as they find the door to the kingdom of heaven too difficult of entrance, and as well be shut at once, for it is affirmed "that it is easier for a camel to pass through the eye of a needle, than for a rich man to enter in." But have the ranks of poverty furnished no disciples for Christ; has there ever been a degree of poverty so abject as to withhold a sincere worshipper from the Lord; does the gospel in its invitations and provisions take no account of the poor? The new testament record might be blotted out, but while the clear resounding music rings from the evangelical harp of Isaiah—"He that hath no money, come," there would still be room to believe that souls have been charmed by this song of pity and love, who had not even rags to hide their nakedness, nor bread to appease their hunger. But by whom was the Saviour of mankind most honored? By the poor. And by whom was he most dearly beloved? By the poor. And by whom was he most devoutly worshipped and most faithfully served? By the poor. He exacted a costly service, and it was found that the very poorest only could best render it. They that had possessions went away sorrowful, but they that had none offered in stead, the superior wealth of the heart, a faith that regarded nothing lost to follow him, and a zeal of love that left all to gain his fellowship. Of blessed memory is that dear woman whose total worldly possession consisted of an alabaster box of ointment, even that she broke in the affluence of gratitude, and with adoring love, poured the precious contents upon the person of our Lord. The excuse of poverty has been weighed and found wanting—But it is urged that

2. Business has claims that must be met. Everything needful for the support of the family depends upon a strict attention to business. Besides these claims derive an additional sanction from the general indebtedness of the people, and honest men must make a point of satisfying their creditors." This excuse boldly avers a total dissent from the rule that Christian principle should control in the choice of an occupation, and as openly asserts that a profitable management of business pursuits is irreconcilable with the inclination to observe religious duties. The preference is given not without an apology, to mercenary gain, seeking against Christian thoughtfulness; and every talent is invested in sordid employments without a care to preserve the balance of the mind against that despotic meanness which succeeds in trade otherwise inevitably begets, without pausing to expose the fallacy which seeks to array the common duties of life against the Christian calling. We will rather seek out the significance which this excuse contains. It is not merely a result of the unequal states of religious feelings, which in this case shows itself to be at the lowest ebb; it betrays a sadder defect, a lack of principle to sustain the purer impulses springing from a religious life; it discovers a lack of the proper elements for the formation of Christian character. The mind has been restricted in culture, the heart in its affections. In neither case has there been any vital sympathy with the sublime plans of the divine benevolence, nor with the example and knowledge of devout men in all ages, and in all countries, lifting up their business into the region of Christian service, and sustaining them at this proper elevation, by the quiet energy of a sanctified nature until riches, and business employments received the stamp of divine approval, and were transformed into spiritual agencies, to aid in the extension; in every direction, of the Redeemer's Kingdom, would have restrained them, at least from an open alliance with the calumniators of religion. There remains yet another excuse.

TO BE CONTINUED.

ANNUAL MEETING OF THE BOARD OF DOMESTIC MISSIONS.

The annual meeting of the Board of Domestic Missions was opened at 3 o'clock P. M.

Also, Bishops Early, Paine, Pierce, Wightman, Marvin, Doggett, and McTyeire—ex officio members of the Board. Bishop Early in the Chair.

Rev. J. B. McFerrin, D.D., the Secretary of the Board of Domestic Missions, presented his First Annual Report, which was adopted as follows:

FIRST ANNUAL REPORT OF THE SECRETARY OF THE BOARD OF DOMESTIC MISSIONS, M. E. CHURCH, SOUTH.

The Secretary begs leave to submit his first annual report. It is not expected, as his work is just being organized, that he should do more at present than give a concise statement of what has been accomplished and of what lies before the Church in this department of her missionary enterprise.

Before doing this, however, he feels it to be his mournful duty to refer to the death of two of the honored members of this Board. First, the Rev. Samuel D. Baldwin, D.D., who departed this life Oct. 8, 1866, in full hope of a glorious immortality; and second, the Rev. Bishop Joshua Soule, our senior Superintendent, who, full of years and full of honors, exchanged on the 6th of March, 1867, the cross for a crown. These two distinguished servants of the Church, the one in the brilliant career of his usefulness, and the other in the full perfection of the graces of the Holy Spirit, have been removed from us; and while we mourn their loss, they rejoice in the salvation which our gospel brings to every believer. Though dead, they both still speak and urge us on in our "work of faith and labor of love."

The Secretary entered actively upon his duties June 1, 1866. He has visited eight Annual Conferences, and many other points in various parts of our field; he has preached sermons; made addresses; lifted collections; written appeals, and corresponded extensively.

Special reference has been had to our foreign work, and the extinguishment of the old debt. In all our public collections a liberal division has been made with the Foreign Board. The plan of the General Conference in sustaining our missionary work by the agency of two Boards, is generally approved by both preachers and people. At all the Annual Conferences your Secretary attended, Conference Boards were appointed, and strong resolutions were adopted to carry forward the work of Domestic Missions. This is true, he believes, of all the Conferences in the Connection, and much is expected; grand results are anticipated. With the hearty co-operation of the Bishops and the press, we think our Domestic Missions will prove a glorious success.

The field before us is inviting; the demands are pressing. We have

First, many thousands of the poor among our native population, who are anxious to have the word preached and the sacraments administered, and yet they have not the means to sustain ministers of the gospel. These sheep must not be left to perish in the wilderness, but they must be sought and led to pastures where they will be fed and grow and prosper as the fold of Christ. There are in our bounds many districts and circuits which in former years were able to support the ministry, that are now dependent upon their more wealthy and fortunate brethren. They must be aided in the days of their adversity. In this connection we mention likewise the multitudes about our towns and cities who are so vicious, and so steeped in crime and lost to righteousness, that they cannot be reached by the ordinary ministrations of the gospel. Extra efforts must be made for their salvation. This is an important branch of our Domestic Missionary labor, a portion of the field that must not be neglected. Go into the lanes and highways, and bring in the halt, the blind, the maimed, that my house may be filled, is the order of the Master.

Second. We have an interesting class of foreigners among us who must be taught the way of life. They are infidels or false professors, having erroneous views of religion. They must be brought under evangelical teaching, or they will not only be lost themselves, but will lead others to destruction. If not converted, they will spread their pernicious doctrines among our native population, and thus make infidels or false professors of our own children.

There is to be a strong conflict between Christianity and infidelity, and the success and triumph of the former depends in a large measure upon the missionary spirit of the Church. Indeed, the Church must have a missionary spirit in order to her own success. Without that aggressive spirit that moves to action and conquest, the Church will stagnate and finally die. No Church can live and prosper that does not cultivate the spirit of Missions.

Thirdly. The colored population of our land specially demand our attention. These people in years gone by were in a great measure dependent upon us for religious instruction; and right well did our ministers address themselves to this important task. Thousands, multiplied, were converted and placed under regular pastoral care, and the race was rapidly progressing in civilization and Christianity. A change came: these people have been emancipated, and are now free. The struggle by which they were liberated was convulsive, and effected a serious change in their relations to the white population. And as was natural, this change, under the press of circumstances, created prejudice in the minds of many—prejudice in the mind of the black man, who has been taught by our opponents to regard his former owner as his worst enemy; and prejudice in the mind of the white man against the policy of those who would coerce the social equality of the races. Thus, to some extent, has the colored man been alienated from his best friends. Others, taking advantage of this state of things, have striven to draw away the colored membership of our Church, and in some instances they have succeeded, and have distracted those who were once happy in their Church relations. Yet it must be borne in mind, that thousands of these people still adhere to our Communion, and look to us for religious instruction, and we will prove faithless if we fail according to our ability to minister to their edification and spiritual comfort. Your Secretary is of opinion that the ministry of our Church is not sufficiently avowed to the importance of this subject. Our late General Conference devised judicious and liberal measures for the future relations of the colored population to our Church, and for the salvation of all such as may choose to co-operate with us. These measures should be carried out faithfully, and great good will be accomplished. And this constitutes a part of our Domestic Missionary work, and should be kept constantly before the minds of all who love the Lord Jesus Christ.

In view of the foregoing, it will be seen that large means will be required to sustain the cause of Domestic Missions in our Church. And yet our country is desolated, our people impoverished, and the cry for bread comes from many quarters.

What shall be done? How shall these means be commanded? We answer: "The Lord will provide." Let us build the altar and prepare the wood, and God will provide the sacrifice. The gold and silver are his, and he will fill our treasury if we but trust him and do our duty. The Secretary has been laboring to introduce into all our Conferences a method of raising funds by small contributions, and to engage and interest all our members in our missionary work. This fully accomplished, there will be no lack of money to carry out all our benevolent enterprises.

J. B. McFERRIN,
Sec'y Board of Dom. Missions.

Rev. A. P. McFerrin, Treasurer of the Board of Domestic Missions, presented his first Annual Report, which was received.

A communication was received from E. W. Schon, D.D., Secretary of the Board of Foreign Missions, which was read and considered.

A letter from Rev. Nathan Scarritt, of Kansas, was received and read.

On motion of Dr. W. A. Anderson, the postscript, No. 2, was referred to the Bishops.

On motion of Bishop Paine, so much of Rev. Nathan Scarritt's letter as related to a settlement with the estate of Thos. Johnson, was referred to the Committee appointed by the Board of Foreign Missions.

On motion of Bishop Marvin, so much of Rev. Nathan Scarritt's letter as related to Council Grove, was referred to the same committee.

On motion of Dr. Green, all of Rev. N. Scarritt's letter and these Resolutions were referred to the Board of Foreign Missions.

A letter from the Rev. J. F. Cox was received and read: $26.47 referred to in the letter, was appropriated to the Missionary Board of the N. W. Texas Conference, to be expended for Domestic Missions.

Communications from Rev. M. M. Pugh and Rev. A. W. Thompson, of Missouri, were received, read and considered.

On motion of Bishop McTyeire, it was resolved that the Board of Domestic Missions will, or shall, at each annual meeting, make appropriations to the Missionary Boards of the Annual Conferences.

On motion, the Board adjourned, to meet at 3 o'clock, April 15.

ROBERT A. YOUNG,
Secretary, pro tem.

Southern Methodist Pub. House, Apr. 15, 1867.

AFTERNOON, 3 o'clock, Apr. 16, 1867.

The Board of Domestic Missions met. Present—A. L. P. Green, D.D., President; Thos. O. Summers, D.D., 3d Vice-President; Rev. A. H. Redford, 4th Vice-President; Jno. B. McFerrin, D.D., Secretary; Rev. A. P. McFerrin, Treasurer. Rev. Jno. F. Hughes, Rev. W. C. Johnson, Rev. W. D. F. Sawrie, Rev. John Morrow, Robt. A. Young, Geo. W. Smith, Wm. T. Gates, Dr. W. H. Morgan, and M. Hamilton—Managers.

Also, Bishops Wightman, Marvin, Early, Pierce, Andrew, Doggett, and McTyeire—ex officio members of the Board.

Bishop Early in the Chair. Prayer was offered by Rev. P. M. Pinckard, of St. Louis.

Rev. W. C. Johnson offered the following Resolution, which was adopted:

Resolved, That each Annual Conference Missionary Board is hereby requested to transmit, by its Secretary, to the Secretary of this Board, as part of its Annual Report, an exact statement of the amount of money received during the year for Domestic Missions, and that the Secretary of this Board is directed to call especial attention to this request.

On motion of Bishop Pierce, Dr. McFerrin, the Secretary of this Board, is requested to take such respite from the active duties of his office as his health may demand.

The following was offered by Dr. Green:

Resolved, That the payment of $20 shall constitute the giver an honorary member of this Board, and the payment of $100 a life patron of this Board.

On motion, the Board adjourned until 3 o'clock, April 17.

ROBERT A. YOUNG,
Secretary, pro tem.

MISSIONARY ANNIVERSARY AT TULIP STREET CHURCH, APRIL 17, 1867.

Bishop McTyeire in the Chair. Prayer by Rev. Dr. J. R. Finley. Eloquent and appropriate addresses were delivered by Bishops Wightman and Pierce. A collection was taken up amounting to $398.50. The meeting closed with the Doxology and benediction, by Bishop Marvin.

The Board of Domestic Missions met at 3 o'clock, April 17, 1867.

Present—A. L. P. Green, D.D., President; Thos. O. Summers, D.D., 3d Vice-President; Rev. A. H. Redford, 4th Vice-President; Jno. B. McFerrin, D.D., Secretary; Rev. A. P. McFerrin, Treasurer; Rev. W. D. F. Sawrie, R. A. Young, M. Hamilton, G. W. Smith, Wm. T. Gates, Rev. W. C. Johnson—Managers.

Rev. A. L. P. Green, D.D., in the Chair. Prayer by Rev. Thomas Taylor, of Memphis Conference.

Minutes read and approved. After considerable debate on Dr. Green's resolution concerning honorary memberships and life patrons of the Board of domestic Missions, R. A. Young offered the following substitute:

Resolved, That on the payment of $20 any person may be constituted a patron of our Domestic Missions.

On motion of Dr. Summers, the Board postponed the consideration of this subject.

A letter was received from Rev. B. R. Duval, and referred to the Board of Foreign Missions.

Adjourned with the benediction. ROBERT A. YOUNG, Secretary, pro tem.

MEETING AT ELM STREET.
A meeting was held on Wednesday evening at Elm street. An excellent address was delivered by the Rev. A. R. Winsford, of Little Rock Conference. At the close a collection was taken up, evincing a spirit of liberality in this congregation, which has just exchanged the Mulberry Street Church for this new and beautiful house, giving twelve thousand five hundred dollars difference.

J. B. McFERRIN, Sec'y.

The President in accord with the Attorney General.

WASHINGTON, April 19.—During an interview which several distinguished conservative Louisianians had yesterday with the Attorney-general, Mr. Stanbery, on being consulted in regard to the order issued by General Sheridan in reference to registration in Louisiana under the military bill, stated that General Sheridan had not thought it necessary to submit to him a single point for a decision as to the construction to be placed on the provisions of that measure. General Schofield, on the contrary, had done this.

The attorney general further expressed it as his opinion that Gen. Sheridan had exceeded his authority, but that this would be duly rectified, without prejudice to those who have been excluded in the meantime.

He also stated that no election that might be held would be voided unless a proper registration had previously been made of all qualified voters. The omission of any duly qualified, that is, would vitiate it.

He intimated, however, that his close and constant pre-occupations in the case of the injunction taken out in behalf of the State of Georgia, and other business, would prevent him from giving a formal decision on the registration question for a couple of weeks.

In reply to the remark that such a delay might tend to prevent a proper registration, Mr. Stanbery stated that the necessary steps would be taken to cover that point also.

At a subsequent interview which the same delegation had with the President, Mr. Johnson expressed the fullest accord with the opinions of the attorney general and with the positions he had laid down.

He re-assured them that no necessary executive interference would be found lacking for the purpose of maintaining all rights secured under the reconstruction acts.

RICHMOND, April 18.—The convention met at 10 o'clock to-day. The prevailing feeling shown in speeches of colored members, was for confiscation. One or two who opposed them were saluted by cries of "Cop-head."

The announcement by Freeland, of Petersburg, that if Congress did not give the negroes land they would take it by violence, was received with much applause.

The white members did not seem to relish the confiscation idea and tried to throw cold water on it.

A committee reported an address to the people of the State and series of resolutions.

The address first recites the wrongs by rebels, but says those who fought unwillingly ought to be forgiven. Then declares allegiance to the Republicans and the following platform: Honor and reward to labor. Homes for the homeless who are willing to work. Property to bear the burden of taxation. Property of the State must educate the children of the State. Free schools and universal education.

It threatens the land monopolists of the State with confiscation if they oppress the laborer or attempt to control his vote, or molest the school teachers or friends of freed-men.

The resolutions thank the thirty-ninth Congress for its legislation, and pledge the convention to aid in carrying it out, as the only means of early admission into the Union. Adopt the principles and platform of the national Republican party. Advocate equal rights to all, including the right to hold office, and refuse to support for office any man who does not openly identify himself with the Republicans.

Both addresses and resolutions were adopted unanimously.

A resolution favoring confiscation, was, after a sharp debate, referred. A resolution indorsing President Johnson was voted down.

The meeting adjourned sine die. Both houses of the legislature passed a bill consolidating the Norfolk and Petersburg, South Side, and Virginia and Tennessee Railroads into one road, to be called the Atlantic, Mississippi and Ohio railroad.

Dr. Winans on Dr. Clarke.

PSALMS.

XL 8. “He killed that a human victim of infinite merit should be offered for the redemption of mankind.”

I scruple not to assert that God never scilted thus. If He had He would have willed an utter impossibility. That cannot have infinite merit which is not itself infinite; But no human victim is infinite; therefore no human victim having infinite merit could be offered. But it may be said that infinite merit was imparted to the humanity by the Deity which took it into unity with himself. No being can offer all that he has without exhausting his own resources; but the Deity, in the person of Jesus Christ, had no more than infinite merit; therefore if He imputed infinite merit to the Humanity and that infinite merit was offered up for mankind; the Deity retained no merit. But I say further, there was no need for infinite merit in the case. Man as a finite being could not have any infinite necessity. The law given to man was limited in its demands both as to extent and duration, for in the extent of its requirements it was limited, at least by man’s capacity; and as to its duration it was limited, for its obligation upon man had a beginning. The guilt incurred by man could not have been infinite for that guilt would be according to the nature of the law violated by man and his capacity of action. Nor was the punishment incurred by him infinite; for he could not endure infinite punishment. Why, then, could not a creature redeem man? First—because no creature, nor all creatures together, have any thing to offer; they owe their all to God. Second—because, if they have any disposable merit, as the penalty of the law was death, they must have destroyed themselves in saving man: for they had not life in themselves. I regret exceedingly that the Doctor did not in this case, as he did in regard to the eternal Sonship, shake off the scholastic fetters in which orthodoxy has so long groined, and view this subject in the sober light of reason and scripture: for I have no hesitation in asserting that there is not one Scripture that either directly or indirectly favors the monstrous notion of an infinite atonement. That there is an atonement which could be made by none but Emanuel, I most firmly believe: it is my only ground of hope for eternity; and that this atonement is commensurate with the necessity of every child of men I rejoice to believe: but that it is infinite, I say cannot be true, because it is unnecessary, impossible and absurd.

XLVIII 9. “Who were Abraham’s people? Not the Jews.”

The Doctor and St. Paul are clearly at issue on this subject: the Doctor asserting that the Jews were the people of Abraham; St. Paul asserting (Romans IV, 11, 12) that inasmuch as Abraham received the covenant in uncircumcision and was afterwards circumcised, he became the father of both Gentiles and Jews, indiscriminately, who tread in the steps of their father Abraham.—Thus proving that, under the gospel dispensation, uncircumcision (contrary to the opinion of the Doctor) is nothing; and that circumcision (contrary to the opinion of the Jews) is also, nothing; that believers, whether Jews or Gentiles, are all the people of Abraham.

LXII 18. “God would not predict a thing as absolutely certain, which was still poised between a possibility of being and not being; and which He had left, as He does all contingencies, to the free will of His creatures to turn the scale.”

Did our Saviour predict as absolutely certain the treachery of Judas, and the denial of his master by Peter? If He did not, then we have no certain ground to believe that He ever predicted anything as absolutely certain. If He did, were these not contingent events; still poised between the possibility of being and not being? If they were not, the crimes of Judas and Peter were necessary when the Saviour foretold them; Peter’s, it would seem, before he himself had conceived the idea of such a crime! And who could render these crimes necessary? None, surely, but God; and if He have made two crimes necessary, we have no reason to say that He has not rendered all others so also. If, however, Judas and Peter acted freely, notwithstanding the Divine presence, then is the Doctor’s assertion false; and there may be confidence placed in prophecy without foolishly charging God as the author of sin. I have an absolute certainty of events that are now passing, though they are perfectly contingent. I suppose that the knowledge of the Deity bears the same relation to Eternity that mine does to the present moment. If it do not, He is not the same in knowledge yesterday, today, and forever. If He do, then He knows past, present, and future events as absolutely certain, though the future are as contingent in their nature as the past.

LXIII 7. “By fatness, or corpulency, the natural lines of the face are changed, or rather obliterated. The characteristic distinctions are gone, and we see little remaining besides the human hog.”

Were corpulency always the effect of excess or luxury, this philippic of the Doctor, though indelicately severe, would perhaps be just: but as it is often the effect of constitution, and exists with persons remarkable for temperance, the Doctor is chargeable not only with rudeness and insolence to many of his most respectable fellow-creatures, but to God; also, who, in cases of constitutional corpulency, is the cause of what the Doctor treats so rudely.

—27. “The term perish is generally used to signify a coming to nothing—being annihilated; and by some it is thus applied to the final impenitent: they shall all be annihilated. But where is this to be found in the Scriptures? In no part.”

This passage is a plain contradiction of the Doctor’s note on psalm ix 7. I am well satisfied that this contradiction is the result of carelessness in the Doctor. He never, certainly, embraced the doctrine of that note. But a man of his weight and influence should scrupulously avoid all inaccuracies; especially when they may have such awful practical influence as in his note on the above psalm. Many would rejoice to believe their being would end at death, for then they could indulge in sin without fear of future punishment.

LXXXII 5. “Happy England!—All thy judges are learned, righteous, and impartial.”

Did the Doctor believe all this? I fear he forgot, at least for a moment, the sacred obligation of truth when intervening between him and his sycophantic loyalty. The judges of England may be a body of men respectable for their learning, rectitude and impartiality; but are they all deserving of all the praise the Doctor gives them? I confess I do not believe they are. Perhaps the Methodist preachers in England are more culpable for their flattery to government (not for their loyalty) than on any other score. Mr. Drew, in his Life of Dr. Coke, swells the praise of king and ministers for refusing the royal sanction to a colonial act in Jamaica far worse than even Poindexter’s detestable slave-law in Mississippi, after suffering that law to remain eighteen months in force after knowing its character, during which time thousands were suffering its iniquitous operation. They deserved moderate approbation for refusing the royal sanction had they done it promptly; as it was, instead of praise, they deserved detestation. The Doctor abounds in undeserved encomiums on the government of his country, than which few more corrupt were ever permitted to continue.

Ibid. Analysis. III part. “Judges—their function is from God, and God alone is to reform, or strip, or punish them.”

Divine right must be at a sore shift when driven to this. Even subaltern justicians, for it is of such the Doctor is speaking, must not be stripped of the robe they pollute, nor punished for polluting it, unless by the hand of God! This is a higher grade of tory-insanity than ever I met with before. But there is little danger that Americans, or indeed, even Britons, will take their political creed out of Dr. Clarke’s Commentary. I doubt whether Majesty itself relishes ultra legitimacy and divine right with quite so high seasoning.

BAPTISMAL REGENERATION.

[CONCLUDED.]

Next, let us turn from the doctrines of Scripture to its facts, and we shall see the same truths declared. The Christian dispensation we find to be only a continuation, a fuller development of the Jewish; it is the same church, but expanded into a nobler form; as, therefore, baptism in the new church took the place of circumcision in the old, we may expect to find a perfect parallel between the two; but was the inward change always associated with the outward form among the Jews? Were all the circumcised regenerated?

But here two facts come before us, showing that salvation was not necessarily tied to any outward rite at all; one is, that a circumcision was first instituted in the days of Abraham, Abel and Noah, and Enoch, and other good men among the early patriarchs, must have gone to heaven without it; they certainly were regenerated, and they certainly were not either baptized or circumcised, for they lived before Abraham was born.

The other fact is that when our Lord instituted the ordinance of baptism, he had all Christians baptized, both Jews and Gentiles, circumcised as well as uncircumcised; but if these Jewish converts had been already regenerated by circumcision, what was the use in doing that which in the Romish view regenerated them over again? In giving them two spiritual new births? According to their theory was not this saying them twice? A thing useless and absurd.

But we are not left to inference; this very doctrine that the outward sign necessarily involved the inward blessing was the great bane of the Jewish people; it was what rendered their church merely a whitened sepulchre; it was what filled them with pride when they should have been humbled in the dust; it was what made them boast in fancied security and salvation, when they were tottering over the very brink of the pit, and so regeneration by circumcision was an error which the prophets and the Apostles took particular pains to disprove. “Egypt, and Judah, and Edom, all these nations,” says Jeremiah, “are uncircumcised, and all the house of Israel are uncircumcised in the heart.” “When I have brought them into the land of their enemies,” said God through Moses, “if then their uncircumcised hearts be humbled, I will remember my covenant with Jacob.” “Ye stiff-necked and uncircumcised in heart and ears, ye do always resist the Holy Ghost!” exclaims the martyr Stephen to the assembled Sanhedrim of the Jews; yet the persons spoken of and addressed thus had all been outwardly circumcised; they had received the visible sign, but without the inward grace. Ah! it was a hard lesson for the Jew, trusting in the efficacy of his rites and ordinances. Yet his own Scriptures abundantly proved the truth of St. Paul’s remark: “He is not a Jew who is one outwardly, neither is that circumcision which is one outwardly in the flesh; but he is a Jew who is one inwardly; and circumcision is that of the heart, in the spirit and not in the letter; whose praise is not of men but of God.” But we should remember that these words apply to us as forcibly as they did to the Jews; their ceremony corresponded perfectly with ours, and if circumcision of the heart was not necessarily tied to circumcision of the flesh, neither is baptism of the heart tied necessarily to baptism of the flesh!

But perhaps the detailed instances given us in Holy Writ may set this matter before us still more plainly. For example, we find cases of persons mentioned there in whom regeneration took place before baptism; and some in whom it took place without baptism ever having been administered at all. The penitent malcontent who expired at the side of his crucified Lord was as surely saved as was Enoch, for Christ said unto him, “Verily, today thou shalt be with me in Paradise;” he must, therefore, have been regenerated, yet he was never baptized. The case of the Roman centurion, Cornelius, is that of one who was regenerated before baptism. The character of this man as given, not by erring man, but by the infallible voice of inspiration itself, is that he was a devout man, who feared God and prayed always to him. Could this man have been unregenerate? No, for the prayers of such, we are told, are an abomination to the Lord, whereas those of Cornelius are positively declared to have come up for a memorial before God. Yet all this is said of him previous to his public initiation into the Church. More than this, it is plainly told that he was baptized by the Holy Ghost before he was baptized by Peter. He was spiritually born again, before he received from the Apostle the sign of the new birth, else his devotion and prayers were not spiritual and holy acts, agreeable to God, for there can not be an effort prior to its cause. A man can not perform spiritual acts before he is spiritually born, any more than he can perform natural acts before he is naturally born.

On the other hand, in the history of Simon Magus, we have an instance of a person’s having been duly baptized, and yet remaining unregenerate. When Philip preached the name of Christ, and confirmed his words by miracles, this Simon, we are told, wondered at the things which were done, and became baptized. But when Peter and John came to complete the labors of Philip, he proposed to buy the power of conferring the Holy Ghost, a proposal which called forth the rebuke of Peter: “Thou hast neither part nor lot in this matter, for thy heart is not right in the sight of God. Thou art in the gall of bitterness and the bond of iniquity.” Hymenæus and Philetus, Phyllogos and Hermogenes were also probably baptized by inspired ministers, as were likewise these gross transgressors of the seven churches of Asia, so severely reproved by Christ in the Apocalypse. It is not pretended that these men were regenerated. From all which it appears that regeneration may take place without baptism, and that baptism may take place without regeneration.

To sum up all, The Scriptural doctrine is seen to be that baptism is an honorable ordinance appointed by Christ himself as a sign or emblem of our new birth in holiness, from which, when rightly used, we have a right to expect great blessings, but that there is no charm or magical influence in the ceremony itself, or in the water used in it, to affect our souls by the mere administration of the rite. As any one, on being formally admitted as a citizen of a town, in taking the oath of citizenship, receives an assurance that he is entitled to all the rights and privileges of the place, so every one who is baptized is certified thereby of his right to all the promises and blessings of the Christian Church; but mark, it is upon the condition that he sincerely repents of his previous rebellions, and that he honestly intends to give full and hearty allegiance in the future to the Saviour. Without this it is an empty and meaningless form; therefore the rite in itself has no saving virtue; it does not link to itself necessarily any of the mercies of God; it brings with it not a germ of holiness or security to the faithless or impenitent heart. It connects us with the visible Church; it entitles us to be enrolled among the saints on earth. But the records and lists of the invisible Church are made up from the rolls of the spiritually regenerate, which, alas, in many cases are far different. The earthly Church is a net cast into the sea, which gathers of every kind of fish, good and bad, and no separation can now be made, but it will all be drawn ashore at the day of judgment, and then the good shall be gathered into vessels, and the bad be cast away. A mere ecclesiastical connection between the Church, a mere baptismal holiness, will not suffice then. “Many of the children of the kingdom,” the Saviour tells us, “shall then be cast into utter darkness.”

There is great reason for us, my brethren, to dread the doctrine that all the baptized are saved. It leaves and spoils the religion of many Christians, and insensibly paves the way for a long train of unscriptural notions; it leads to a mere sacramental Christianity—a religion of mere ordinances rather than of holy life—a religion in which Christ has not his rightful office, nor faith its rightful place; it leads us to think that we are born of God, while our hearts are set upon this world and buried in its concerns; it leads us to imagine that we are the sons of God, while we are not led by the Spirit of God. The doctrine of the transmission of saving grace by the sacraments is one of the most fearful errors of the times; it is the pernicious soil of the worst heresies of the Roman Church; and just so far as it is received into the hearts of the people, it prepares them for trusting their all of hope and final blessedness upon a scheme that may not reach the soul, purge out its stains, or save it from the final wrath of God. Oh, let us remember that there is but one fountain to which we can go for the washing of the soul, and when we have bathed in that pure and precious flood, the blood of Jesus, then may we indeed receive the beautiful symbol of baptism by water, and every drop will seal unto us the love of the Father, the forgiveness of all our sins.

TRADITIONS VERSUS THE BIBLE.

Q. Is tradition of the same authority as the Bible?

A. No tradition but what is contained in the Bible has any authority of inspiration, and consequently is not binding on the conscience. Paul speaks of false tradition in Col. 2: 8, and of true tradition in 1 Peter 1: 18.

The Church of Rome has decreed the traditions of the Christian fathers, from the second to the fifth and sixth centuries after the Apostles had closed their mission and sealed the Book of Revelations, as of equal authority with the sacred Scriptures; but the traditions of these early fathers were not inspired, and the Church of Rome has greatly corrupted them and made them speak to suit their unrighteous purposes. The fathers were but men, and had no authority to prescribe rules of faith and practice.

Q. Does not the High Church of England rely on the tradition of the fathers thus corrupted by Rome?

A. Yes, because they deduce “apostolic succession” from the Popes of Rome.

Q. What proofs have you that the traditions of the fathers were not safe to rely upon?

A. Many, but the three principal are the following: First, the fathers were not inspired and were liable to err.

Second, fathers contradicted fathers. Councils contradicted councils. Bishops or Popes contradicted each other. (See Edgar’s “Variations of Popery.”)

Third Reason, forgeries were committed by the Roman priesthood at various periods. The Council of Nice added fifty forged decretals to the Canons of the Church. (See Bower on the Councils, 4th and 5th cent. Gesler, vol. 1, page 460 to 550.) Sylvester, bishop of Rome, inserted thirty-five forged decretals in his epistles to Gregory the Great. (Bower, Vol. 2 and 3rd Chap. Hallam’s “Middle Ages,” c. 7, p. 261 to 340.) Mosheim states that “forgeries were deemed lawful for the good of the Church.” (Mosheim I, 344.) The historian Dannon says “fictitious canons, mutilated passages, false decretals, all sorts of lies, abound in the monstrous production of Pope Gratian’s decretals.” (See Dannon on the Canons.) Bonius of Bologna, in 1610, committed one of the greatest forgeries on record in pretending that Constantine bestowed the Papal Territories on Pope Sylvester, and made the Pope a temporal prince. This forgery is recorded in full in “Concordantia Discordantium Canonum,” 1, 3, 151; and also in Gibbon.

Q. Do the Roman and the High Church of England omit the Scriptures altogether in building up their imaginary edifices?

A. They insert, but misinterpret, just Scripture enough to give a plausible appearance of support from the Bible. For instance, they quote John 20: 23 for absolution: “Whosoever sins ye remit, they are remitted unto them; and whose sins ye retain, they are retained.” Here they commit two errors. The first error is, in applying to themselves what Christ applied to his inspired Apostles. In virtue of this power, Paul struck Elymas blind, and Peter struck Ananias and Sapphira dead. This gift ceased with the Apostles. The priests applying the passage to themselves as giving them the power of absolution is ridiculous. The second error consists in another misinterpretation. The passage applies only to the discipline of the Church in admitting or rejecting members.

They also quote James 5: 17: “Confess your faults one to another.” Here there is no direction to go to a priest. The duty is reciprocal. If I confess to the priest, he is equally bound to confess to me. What the priest artfully demands is the conscience of the sinner. That is all. If he gets the conscience of his weak-minded dupes, he knows he can play with them as grinnalkin with a mouse. And what else is the aim of the High Church of England in proposing priestly “absolution”? It is to get the conscience and to make their simple votaries slaves.

Seeing God’s providence is manifest in ordinary means, it behooves every man in his calling to use them carefully; and when ordinary means be at hand, we must not look for any help without them, though the Lord be able to do what He will without means. Our Saviour avoucheth it to be flat tempting of God, for Him to leap down from the pinnacle of the temple to the ground; whereas there was an ordinary way at hand to descend by stairs.

From the Anti-Slavery Standard.
Wendell Phillips on Congress, the President, and the Presidency.

Mrs. Anne, Iowa, Apr. 5, 1867.
Dear Standard—It is of course needless for me to tell you of my interest in your labors; yet I do not know that I have anything else to tell you. Thus far distant from the center of public affairs, I hardly dare to risk any conjectures before your readers. It seems to us here that the Fortieth Congress dares not impeach the President. The patronage of the executive has been too strong a temptation for Congressional virtue to resist. How gratefully the members pick up every little crumb of comfort that can be got from any slight show of deference to their opinion on the part of Johnson! Again and again have I trembled lest the two parties should fraternize; they yielding nine-tenths and he yielding nothing except gracious phrases.

Still, I think we may have great trust in the stolid obstinacy of Johnson. That is a reliance which has never yet failed us, and the stock seems inexhaustible. Were he an ordinary man, simply, mulish, he should be tempted to despair. A little complaisance with the temper of the people, and a seeming submission to the military law, would largely re-instate him in public respect and sympathy. But with his sublime self-conceit, and his entire belief that the North is really with him, I think we may trust him to astound the public and exasperate Congress that in due time he will either be impeached or wholly pined in his executive power. Kentucky and Tennessee mules the finest in the world; if any doubts it, let him watch our history the next five years.

Without counting, therefore, on the virtue or intelligence of Congress, I look for constant progress in the right direction. Lord John Russell, you remember, talked of the reform bill of 1831 as a “finality.” It is only a half-way stage on the Congressional road from Lincoln to Stevens. The train goes there to wood and water; gets out of some passengers and a large amount of baggage, to go forward at an increased speed.

All our duty is to press constantly on the nation the absolute necessity of three things.

1. The exercise of the whole power of the government to hold South quiet while the seeds of republicanism get planted.

2. The constitutional amendment securing universal suffrage in all of all State legislation.

3. A constitutional amendment authorizing Congress to establish common schools in any State destitute of them, at the State’s expense.

For these measures we must educate the public mind. These are the soil in which the seeds of government and equal rights alone be trusted.

But I think we must direct our care a little farther ahead. Johnson is watched, and will be peached or crippled. The next important question is, to whom shall the nation give the helm for the next four years? If a Democrat gets it we shall lose two-thirds of the fruits of the war. If a Republican has it we shall lose one-third. With radicalism at the helm, we must have two-thirds of what we have earned. In that next forty years the pressure from business men to the government to open, in some way on some conditions, the channels of business, will be irresistible. The Republican leaders having secured (if they do secure) party triumph by keeping the South out of the electoral college of 1868 will give way. The next administration, therefore, must be expected to settle this question. The door of that man who occupies the White House then will be of immense importance.

Now the country is drifting into the presidency of Gen. Grant, man of whose political ideas (if he has any) no man can tell us anything. The first assertion of his friends is, that he is a safe man, because he has no political ideas, will be in good hands. Alas! our present incunab was once in good hands! Next time we want a man with brains and a heart of his own—not one who depends on being girded and guided “whether he will or not.” Astounding madness! publicans tell us they must nominate Grant, else the Democrats will win. In these hours, when the nation is agonized for existence, we take man for our leader so lacking in principle that he will suit every party equally well! Two armies in deadly fight—one deliberates chooses for its leader such a perfect Swiss, that the other will clutch if the first does not! Lincoln’s hope of Kentucky did us infinite harm. Grant’s love for it will not be allowed to do us more. Memphis, New Orleans and Baltimore are enough to show how Grant does military duty. Do they encourage us to trust him with any civil ones?

BREAKERS AHEAD

BREAKERS AHEAD.

The President hammered away with his gavel, but could not restore order. "Decorum, gentlemen, we must have decorum; surely you have no right to force Mr. Train to speak against his wishes." "I will protect you," said the President to Mr. Train. But it was of no use. It was beyond his power. The gold brokers had Mr. Train fast, and suspended all operations, and insisted upon a speech. Mr. Train seeing that he was in for it, arose, when the cries of "hats off" were renewed, and silence was restored. We can only give a sketch of Mr. Train's remarks bearing on the financial question.

MR. TRAIN'S SPEECH.

"Long meter answers for a Common song;
But Common meter will not answer Long."

yet paid for. The country is stocked with merchandise. The gold market—as you see it to-day (loud laughter)—fifty millions éank in the Stock Exchange, that financial morgue of the land (laughter), since January; in short, paralysis everywhere—the dry rot in Wall street is the new disease—broker's market—nobody paying expenses—cheeks exchanged to show life—all loans on calls—no business doing—no industrial enterprises going on—no confidence anywhere, and all this on an expansion of one thousand millions—make your own inferences, gentlemen—(sensation)—shall I go on—(cries of yes)—another point.

The last panic was peculiar—usually we outsiders caught it. This time you insiders got cleaned out. (Applause and "that's so.") Men who had accumulated their two hundred or five hundred thousand dollars, in small sums these last few years, buried it all in the Greenwood Cemetery of the Stock Exchange. (Mr. O'Brien—or in E Pluribus Unum.) Mr. Train:—Yes; you are one of the many whose epitaph is among the tombstones. (Loud laughter and applause, continuing for several minutes at the repartee.)

The Controller is abroad—he is after the delinquents—1,700 of these institutions are in a flurry—already the big loans are called in, and the street will feel the shock within a week. The recent National bank failures in Washington, Baltimore, Oil Wells, Newton, Hudson, Boston, and Nashville, are only the pimples, the slight eruption on the skin, that tells the experienced eye the painful disease that is straggling within. (Applause.) These banks were established on a 10 per cent. margin, $100,000 bonds gave $90,000 notes. This margin ring of a financial crash in the fall—(remember this is the panic year of the never-failing sevens)—lay it on the administration policy, and when everybody is broken, Congress will meet in the winter and pass Randall's bill, putting greenbacks in the place of the $340,000,000 National bank bonds; pass another bill paying duties on imports in greenbacks—and then another bill paying interest on the $1,400,000,000 five-twenties in legal-tenders. In other words, give the country one currency—that is, twenty-five hundred millions in legal-tenders, instead of sixteen currencies as at present. (Applause.) This makes all happy for the Presidential election of 1868. Delirium tremens requires National whisky to recuperate the system. The whisky will make all vote for Radicalism. They elect the President, and after that the deluge. (Laughter and applause.) Johnson, in his talk with Halpine, the Democratic party and the South thinks that a crash will burst the Radicals. By no means. They will turn it to their advantage. The next war is to be financial. Land and labor against banks and bondholders—and the former own the notes. The South had no debt. The West little. The greenback age wiped off their mortgages, and placed the load on the back of the bondholders. The debt rests uneasily on the seashore and in Europe, and the shadow is on the wall.

Paying gold interest in greenbacks is repudiation, you say. Why so? Newly all the States have done it, New York taking the lead. The finality of all the recent Congressional legislation may be stated in two words--confiscation in the South and repudiation in the North. (Sensation.) The Chicago papers have already sounded the tocsin; we are growing poorer every day. The $2,500,000,000 debt only costs $1,250,000,000. Hence bondholders ask specie payments. The people who did the fighting hold no bonds, and ask for legal-tenders. The rich arranged to have their bonds free from taxation. Hence the rich man, with his millions of untaxed Governments, sends his children to the same school where the poor man, with no bonds, sends his. Hence the poor man is obliged to pay for the education of the rich man's children as well as for his own. (Sensation.) But enough of this. You asked me for a speech, and you have got it. You ask the remedy. Retrench. You have been dancing five years, and the fiddler demands his pay. (Laughter.) When the candle is lighted at both ends, we had better sell it short. (Laughter.) A few Thoughts on Girls' Education.

From the day a boy enters school, until the hour he leaves it, he enjoys educational privileges continually in the ascendant, steadily and proportionately increasing in value with each new year of study on which he enters. But it is very different in regard to girls. Up to a certain age, averaging from fourteen to sixteen years, this statement may, indeed (though in a lesser degree,) apply to them as well as to boys; but when that age is arrived at, their educational privileges, instead of rising with the requirements of the girls' minds, very sensibly decline, and are almost entirely embraced under the head of "accomplishments," so-called.

In order that the full evil of this system be duly appreciated, we have to consider what a momentous period this age is in a girl's education. She has passed beyond the indifference of childhood in regard to knowledge, and has just entered, bewildered, upon a new phase of her intellectual being. Vague aspirations and indefinite longings for the good and high, are swelling and surging in her soul; and she is at that crisis of her mind's life, when, if not judiciously and sympathetically directed, she may weary of those unsatisfied yearnings which no one will help her to understand or feel; turn from her "righteous discontent" to a fatal contentment, so as to lose irrecoverably her desire for true knowledge, and delight herself with "the husks on which the swine feed." It is the turning point of her soul's education; and it rests in great degree with the teacher whether she turn out a woman in the best sense (because an individual soul, whose individuality has been fostered and guided in the right direction), or only a passive representative of the class called women, with no inner life of her own, no advance as a responsible being towards that life for which, when all is said and done, this life is only the education after all.

Men complain of women as being frivolous ; their interests going out almost exclusively in the direction of petty matters, as dress, gaieties, etc., to the exclusion, in great part, at least, of the subjects worthy of their most earnest thought and warmest sympathy. They say this regretfully, it may be, and oftentimes with contemptuous anger; but their regret is idle, their anger unjustifiable, if they go no farther than that; if, as is too much the case, they sorrow or fume over such a deplorable state of matters, but make no hearty, honest effort to get at and destroy the root of this evil. * *

The days for considering men and women, boys and girls, only as two great bodies, with definite nims and ends as classes to which one great rule and system of education should be subservient, are now passing away, and the age of vital intellectual progress has set in, where each individual soul, as such, is regarded as entitled to that degree of social standing and consideration, to which his or her individual capacity and attainments entitle him or her. This, as I take it, is what the world needs. And in its comprehensive and full ideal of justice, it is surely the best cure for all that veering overmuch, about where the bounds must be fixed between men and women, class to class, in regard to duties and privileges, individual and social.

In the generous system of education now prevalent in our best boys' schools, individuality has not only a wide scope, but also full encouragement, and our deepest and greatest thinkers on the subject are agreed, that the best and wisest scholastic rules are those which give the teacher the greatest margin in regard to individual idiosyncrasies. There is as much individuality amongst them as among boys, and it should have as careful fostering and as judicious direction as they now enjoy. But this is very far from being the case.

The system of tuition to which young girls, from the age of fifteen to eighteen or nineteen years, are for the most part accustomed, is deleterious in the extreme to the healthy and natural development of their mental faculties, and consequently to their ultimate standing in the social scale. Where individuality is cramped, or warped, one of two results must be looked for: either that being who primarily possessed it, becomes a mere nonentity in regard to all mental progress; or, what is as bad in itself, and perhaps more disastrous in effect, that innate strength is turned from pursuit of good to work evil, and from worthy aspirations to those which are unworthy.

Under the present system, a young girl's individuality is cramped as concerns true knowledge; the soul cannot live, much less fully develop without nourishment, any more than the body can. The result of the denial of nutriment to girls' famishing souls, is a state of intellectual apathy which may lapse into worse. But this evil, though bad enough, is comparatively a negative one, a worse positive evil must be looked for where the powers and aspirations of our girls' minds are not only cramped, and made to die the death from lack of nourishment, but where they are fed with deleterious food and made to live, indeed, but so that, though alive, they are in worse condition than if they had ceased to exist. * * *

Frivolity of character and aim is the necessary result of an inadequate and injurious education, and of low views of life and life's ends. "Accomplishments," in the ordinary acceptation of that term, form the great sum of girls' education at the very period of their existence, when a thirst for true knowledge is making itself bitterly, because unavailingly, felt in their souls.

Don'tless these acquirements are in their place, good, but prized higher than wisdom, unduly placed as of first importance, they become in effect worse than useless, even harmful. That they are so prized in point of fact in almost all girls' schools is a sad truth.

This superficiality of the present system is its bane, and is traceable, in the first place, to the parents; in the second, to the teachers or superintendents in the schools themselves. The former send their daughters to "finish" what in reality they are only beginning; judging (with what degree of truth we some of us know,) that what their mothers considered sufficient for them, is enough for their children; and that as, upon the whole, they have found in their personal experience that they have managed to get through life tolerably well, their girls need no more and no better.

This, then, is where the fault of the parents lies; that of the teachers consists in consenting to waive their God-given prerogative of individual judgment at the bidding of such blind parents, — in waiving their right to enforce in their own schools those rules of tuition which they believe to be best fitted to produce a good result. They are content, for the most part, to do in Rome as Romans do, shifting their convictions to suit the market. Therefore, although certainly the fault lies primarily with the parents (because, if they judged more wisely, the teachers would be ready enough to act wisely too,) yet, therein is, at worst, but an error of judgment, whilst that of the teachers is more heinous, — seeing clearly, yet suffering themselves to be led by those whom they know to be blind, and whilst a bad fashion is the fashion, being content to sit still with folded hands, resignedly hoping for better days. How can we hope to rise to the true height of our art, if we bring our conceptions of it down to suit the general demand? Ah, this is the sore point at last! Not what is right, and true, and good, are we unceasingly striving to carry out to perfection, using all our endeavor, such as it is, to make this world of shams truer and nobler; but we go in with the majority and either resolve to wait till some spirit sets the example, or we lead our aid and voice in crying out against prevailing evil; or wish, perhaps, that these same spirits would let the existent state of things continue, rather than embody their principles in words and actions which disturb the world from sleep.

FARM AND GARDEN.

From the American Farmer.

THE PROTECTIVE TARIFF BILL

MESSRS. EDITORS — There is a present no object more worthy of public attention than the protective tariff bill, which our wise Congress is trying to patch up. It is astonishing to me, that none of our able agricultural writers have taken their pen to defeat this unjust, and for our country, ruinous law. A protective tariff is a curse to any country where agriculture is dominating. Read history, go to any country where such exist, and you will find progress slow, or even at a stand still. Can a more unjust and senseless law be made than such as compels 24,000,000 of people to pay protective duty to enrich about 1,000,000 of manufacturers? Even the laborers who work for them must, out of their scanty earnings, pay the toll to enrich their rich masters more and more. How much better would these laborers and their families fare, if they went West, where they, in a few years, by industry, would gain an independence, whereas they in their present position remain at the mercy of their hard masters until the grave embraces them. Why force our country to become a manufacturing country? No country with ample and rich soil like ours should ever attempt to favor manufacturing beyond such as can exist without protection. The time to do so may arrive, but not until hundreds of years have passed and the population has increased beyond the capacity of supporting them by agriculture; then artificial means are required to procure bread. Look at England! In spite of her riches and influence all over the world, what would become of the queen of the seas, if she was to be involved in a war of years' standing? What would become of her, if her artificially created industry did not find a market all over the world? She would perish to death by hunger! And why? because her population, kept at an unnatural height by her factories, would not be able to make or find their bread in their native country. What can induce a country like ours to create such a state of things? Nothing, gentlemen, but the individual interest of most of the men who advocate the protective tariff bill. AGRICULTURE IS THE MOTHER OF OUR COUNTRY! It can not be denied. Point at any man in the United States, I do not care what his position or occupation is, if agriculture fails, he is bound to fail. Lawyers, doctors, merchants, ministers, mechanics and laborers, all would suffer, because they now are living by the products of agriculture, direct or indirect. And why now shall we submit to the more than unjust treatment of this most important class of our citizens, by a protective tariff for the manufacturers? Protective tariff men will say, we also protect the agricultural interest by laying a duty on wool, flax, hemp, etc. No, you do not, gentlemen; your protection of agriculture is a mere humbug. By your protection you only help the farmer to pay a small part of the high rates he has to pay the manufacturers for their articles. For instance, you give the farmer, by your tariff a protection of 13 cents on a pound of wool, which raises the price per pound to 46 cents from 33 cents before the war. Well, before the war he bought—to mention only a few articles—his calico for 12½ cents a yard, now he has to pay 25 cents for the very poorest kind. Before the war he bought a yard of cloth for $1, for which he now has to pay $2 50. Before the war he bought a keg of nails for $3, now he has to pay from $7 to $8. The average increase in price for agricultural products does not exceed 75 per cent., while his expenses, to obtain the same articles he used before the war, are increased from 100 to 150 per cent. Look at the labor he employs. Before the war he could hire help at $12 to $15 per month, and have plenty. Now, as the statistics of the Agricultural Department show, he has to pay an average of $28 per month, and scarce at that. Before the war he paid a mechanic from $1 to $1 50 per day. Now he has to pay $3. If this increase of expenses contributed to improve the situation of the laboring classes, he would, any how, have some consolation, but it does not. The laborer has to spend as much more now than he did before the war as the increase of his earnings. The reason? Because he has to pay about 100 per cent. more now than then for the necessities of life. Doctors, lawyers, etc., charge higher now than then, pleading, as a very good cause, the high taxes. Merchants charge from one half to one quarter of a per cent. more, pleading, for an excuse, enormous taxes. So you see that the taxes on all other branches of society fall back, direct or indirect, on the agricultural population. But how are we to obtain money for the Government treasury? asks the protective tariff bill men. Very simply, gentlemen, by comparatively free trade and direct taxation! Our debt is, say $4,000,000,000, on which we have to pay an average interest of about 7 per cent., makes $280,000,000 per annum. I have not taken the time to ascertain the statistic wealth of the United States, but I certainly remain far below reality, if I put it at $100,000,000,000. Suppose a tax of one half of one per cent. per annum was levied on this amount, it would make the sum $500,000,000, sufficient to pay the interest on our debt and besides $220,000,000 annually of the principal. Through this system we also would be enabled to abolish the internal revenue, a still more hateful and injurious institution than the protective tariff. Also, this tax falls back on the consumer. This would enable us to do away with the whole host of internal revenue officers and half of the custom house officers who now absorb about 20 per cent. of all the taxes now gathered, besides millions that are lost by fraud. But the greatest blessing derived from the abolishment of these heinous taxes would be the improvement of the morality of the people. The taxes abolished, the temptation to avoid or break the law for sake of gain would be removed.

TO AGENTS.

Our agents will please, whenever practicable, forward money by draft on Mobile, or New Orleans, payable to our order. We have reason to believe that of all the monies forwarded to us by mail but a very small amount has failed to reach us: whenever the letters have been registered.

TO SUBSCRIBERS.

Any person wishing to subscribe for this paper can do so, by paying the Methodist preacher in the circuit, and forwarding to us his receipt for three dollars, with the address of the subscriber upon it, stating Post office, State, Circuit, and Conference. The receipt ought to be taken in duplicate.

TO ADVERTISERS.

This paper has for many years been well known in this community as the very best advertising medium by which the business men of the city could bring their merchandise, trades, professions, and the like, before country readers. This is easily understood when it is remembered that the four hundred preachers who are scattered throughout these States in the Rio Grand, East Texas, Louisiana, Mississippi, Montgomery and Alabama Methodist Conferences, are all more or less active agents for the paper; and when it is also remembered that our paper circulates among a large class of people who seldom see any other New Orleans paper.

NEW ORLEANS DISTRICT MEETING.—To be held 4th Saturday and Sabbath in April—Carondelet street church—opening at 10 o'clock A. M.

1. It is desirable that all the official members of the several Quarterly Conferences in the District be present, including Traveling and Local Preachers.

2. That written reports be ready upon—The financial state of the charge—The amount due on parsonages, churches, etc.—Trustees Report.—The state of Sabbath Schools—The state and number of membership—The amounts raised, and the plans at work for Missions, Domestic, Home, and Foreign.

3. That varied interests necessary to strengthen Methodism be considered such as: the best methods for Church Extension; for securing the active co-operation of the membership for supplying the destitute with the gospel; and for the advancement of Education.

HOLINESS.

In these days we seldom hear a sermon from a Methodist pulpit upon the subject of "sanctification." It used to be, no great while ago, a common theme with Methodist preachers. Other denominations have always held it to be one of the weak points of Wesleyan faith. "This doctrine of perfection," as a Presbyterian calls it, is evidently considered by them as one of the extravagancies of Mr. Wesley, a remnant of the old enthusiasm that should be discarded in these days when everybody professing religion has a "sound mind," as well as a new heart. The doctrine of "Christian perfection" is regarded by them now pretty much as they estimated "the new birth" one hundred years ago. It was generally believed that a change had to come over a man sooner or later before he could enter the Kingdom of Heaven: a change that answered to David's "clean heart" and "a right spirit," a change which was probably consummated at the moment of death; but to preach or profess that one could know, or must know positively that he had passed from death to life, from the Power of darkness into the Kingdom of God's dear Son, was thought to be the height of presumption.

All denominations believe that a child of God must become holy before he can be fitted for heaven—must love God with all his heart—but that this will be only accomplished in the expiring hours of his natural life. But we Methodists believe that it is the privilege and the duty of every Christian to be holy during this life. This is a peculiarity of Methodist doctrine, and the only one. If any doubt of this privilege, we reply, in the language of Mr. Wesley, that "the question is not to be decided by abstract reasonings, which may be drawn out into an endless length, and leave the point just as it was before. Neither is it to be determined by the experience of this or that particular person. This proves nothing either way, but to the law and to the testimony." As we barely enter this wide field, in a newspaper article, we will cite only the words of St. John: "Herein is our love made perfect that we may have boldness in the day of judgment: because as he is so are we in this world." "He is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness." "If we walk in the light—we have fellowship one with another, and the blood of Jesus Christ his Son cleanseth us from all sin." Here is a cleansing which takes place subsequently to "walking in the light."

But what is this perfection—perfect in what? In this, "I will circumcise thine heart and the heart of thy seed to love the Lord thy God with all thy heart and with all thy soul." The perfection of keeping the one great commandment—"Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind, and with all thy strength." We may ask in turn, was this law given to be kept, or with any expectation upon the part of God that it would be kept? And inasmuch as our love of God is a direct and immediate consequence upon knowing that He loves us, will He command us to love, and then deny us the privilege of loving Him with all our powers? Such a degree of love in us could be "perfect love"—perfect according to capacity. A pure, divine passion stronger in us than any other passion—than all other—sweeter than life, stronger than death.

This may be called an argument from the nature of the Law, which is another form of Promise. But a higher ground for this expectation of holiness lies in the very nature of the Holy Spirit the Divine Comforter. He renews man, and infuses in him a universal habit of holiness, all the varieties of Christian graces. This He imparts from the immeasurable abyss of His own holiness, for He is the fountain of all holiness and purity. The soul receives from Him a holy principle of grace whereby it is renewed in holiness until it attains a perfection of it. Holiness is His awful nature. The Cherubim and Seraphim cry to Him without ceasing—"Holy, Holy, Holy." His holiness is a "refiner's fire," the hump of the covenant, and the cloven tongue of Pentecost. And he that is baptized with the Holy Ghost, is baptized with fire—fire that consumes sin and destroys whatever there may be in the heart of man that is contrary to God.

To this we also adduce the Saviour's declaration of His triumph over the adversary, that he "saw Satan fall as lightning from heaven." It is this summary and great victory that gives an assurance of our own triumph over sin. We triumph by faith in His triumph. Shall Satan be able still to boast that in no one instance has he been wholly dislodged from the heart of man—never until his victim by the approach of death had ceased to be serviceable? The Kingdom of Christ establishes itself, and writes its laws in the hearts of individuals. There its power and coming are to be manifested. It subdues the world by conquering the empire of the heart, and the tremendous machinery of salvation is to be felt in our own souls, reducing every thought and sentiment into conformity to God's righteous will. "For whosoever is born of God overcometh the world."

Faith is the instrument by which this victory is gained and the only condition of sanctification; but, as in justification, so there is here a repentance going before. Mr. Wesley speaks with great distinctness upon this point. "I do allow all this and maintain it as the truth of God. I allow there is a repentance—a conviction of sin remaining in our hearts, and cleaving to all our words and actions—consequent upon, as well as a repentance previous to justification. It is incumbent on all that are justified to be zealous of good works. And these are so necessary, that if a man wittingly neglect them he cannot reasonably expect that he shall ever be sanctified; he cannot grow in grace in the image of God, the mind which was in Christ Jesus; may he cannot retain the grace he has received, he cannot continue in faith, or in the favor of God. What is the inference we must draw herefrom? Why, that both repentance rightly understood, and the practice of all good works, works of piety, as well works of mercy (now properly so called, since they spring from faith), are in some sense necessary to sanctification. I say repentance rightly understood; for this must not be confounded with the former repentance. The repentance consequent upon justification is widely different from that which is antecedent to it. This implies no guilt, no sense of condemnation, no consciousness of the wrath of God. It does not suppose any doubt of the favor of God, or any "fear that hath torment." Faith specially in the power of Christ's death, and in the merit of it, and that God has promised sanctification, directly obtains this blessing.

The new birth is a resurrection life called forth by the son of God. And it is "the Spirit of him that raised up Jesus, which dwells in us," at work upon the remains of a carnal nature that seeks to know the full "power of His resurrection and the fellowship of his sufferings," "being made conformable to his death." This was the perfection the Apostle sought to experience, the triumph of the resurrection-power over all his afflictions and nature. He pressed towards this "prize of the high calling of God in Jesus Christ." As the resurrection body will be the just expression of our spirits, "the most heavenly bodies given to the most heavenly souls," he reached forth to the highest glory of the risen body of Him who is the first-born from the dead. This spirit of the power of life must reign till it hath put all enemies under its feet, and it is in the dying of the old man that the soul has fellowship with Christ in his sufferings. "It suffers with him," and by the continuing process of the Spirit, it "reigns with him," being changed into his image from glory to glory. It is then the voice of Him that called Jesus from the sepulchre, that bids us "Awake to righteousness and sin not."

PHILANTHROPY—ITS EPOCHS.

The exquisite luxury of experimenting upon other people has ever been the great secret of New England philanthropy. After having introduced thousands of Africans into this country, despite the solemn protestations of Virginia, after getting rid of all she had at home and pocketing their price, Massachusetts could well afford to declare herself the colored man's friend. She traded largely in lint and sugar, the products of slave labor, and at the same time sought to monopolize the manufactures necessary to supply it. She did not hesitate to declare her abhorrence for the institution of slavery; she had a conscience in this matter, and without unusual protection to New England, she could not consent to its existence. But O, it was a great crime, indeed it was; there was no villainy like this villainy; and were it not for the tariff, and the mercy of heaven, the whole country might long since have been consumed!

Now if the mercantile and religious instincts of this people had been let alone they would have continued to act with mutual benevolence and advantage to this day. But there are always some silly persons ready to run before the music. The politicians, too, must practice philanthropy—like the ass that attempted to fawn upon his master. They must introduce "abolition" in the hustings; they, also, have a conscience, and wish to be elected to Congress, for conscience' sake. "This was rather more than the merchants and manufacturers meant, it was too much of a good thing; but there was no way of stopping it. When the war began, and before the war ended it became evident that Othello's occupation was gone: gone in two senses, gone morally, and gone financially. There would soon be no more slavery to weep over, no more cotton to spin. Here concluded the first epoch of New England's philanthropy.

The second took the higher field of patriotism. She fought, bled, and died by proxy, especially in the person of whole regiments of colored troops; recruited in Kentucky, Tennessee, and Louisiana. She bravely stood by her wheels and shops, and at every hazard completed army contracts, fabulous in quantity, and no less fabulous in price. So that when, as a military measure, slavery was destroyed, she wept, but not without comfort, for during the war she had run the whole country through her mills, and returned from the funeral with twenty-five hundred million dollars in her pocket—more cash than the whole mass of slaves were ever worth.

Then the third epoch in her speculative philanthropy began. Slavery is gone, and the war is gone; the only thing that remains is the government. Every man "down east" knows how to milk, he knows a cow, and he knows a "good milker" when he sees it. He has seen the Government, and is already at work. There is no more slavery: O me! But the South is still uneasy, rebellion is rampant, very; the colored man must be educated, his manhood vindicated; the Northern soldier must be rewarded; iron must be protected, cotton must be taxed, religion and loyalty must be fostered. All this may be very well and it sounds disinterested. But when these people begin to indulge in the utterance of sentiments that are supposed to do credit to humanity, experience suggests that mischief is on foot. And at this present time while standing forth in the front advocating universal enfranchisement, they are leading off in the most stupendous scheme ever conceived in any age of the world, or under any government, for enslaving, politically, the entire white population of the Southern and Northern States of this Republic; and thereby controlling its immense patronage and treasure.

The present Military Bill will solidify the entire negro population of the South. This mass will be wielded by the Republicans. The white men of the South will be excluded from the ballot-box in sufficient numbers to give the Southern States to the negro vote. With the Southern States the Radicals can overcome the white voter throughout the North and hold the control of the Government for an indefinite period.

That registration means this in this city and in the country, and this only, can be easily understood by reading the subjoined items from the Picayune and Crescent.

REGISTRATION.—The crowd around the First District registry office continues as great as ever. From what we can learn not more than one-tenth of those registered are whites. In fact, the law as interpreted by the registrars of the city will disfranchise four-fifths of our white citizens, therefore a great many are deterred from even making an attempt to register. In all probability affairs will remain in this condition unless additional instructions are received from Washington. If no change is made the vote polled at the first election will be almost exclusively black. This is, certainly, a very unsatisfactory state of affairs, for a great commercial emporium like ours. And right here we may say, the "vaunting ambition" of many who are now so eager to secure the control of the city, may overleap itself if this policy is steadily pursued. The colored people given unlimited control have a right to use it to their best advantage, and the insignificant number of Radicals in our midst, who attempt to control their vote, may find that they have undertaken more than they can accomplish, and in their turn must give way to the majority in color. We have already heard it whispered that the propriety of having a full black ticket is being discussed. With the present system of registration, such a ticket must be successful. Picayune.

REGISTRATION IN THE COUNTRY.—During the present week, it is anticipated nearly all the newly appointed registrars of voters will be at their posts making preparations for opening the registry offices by the 1st proximo, as prescribed in the order. Gen. Sheridan's headquarters were yesterday thronged with these officials, waiting for their commissions—or rather official copies of the order making the appointments, which is equivalent thereto. With scarcely an exception these registrars are entire strangers in the communities to which they are directed to proceed, but of course this will be found little if any drawback in the conducting the registration. Printed general instructions, it is understood, will be furnished. Crescent.

RAISE CORN.

It was a remark of Mr. Clay's when making a speech in New Orleans some years ago, to raise supplies for Ireland necessitated by the potato rot—"That as a people we were not half thankful enough for the invaluable blessing of Indian corn." There are various considerations why our planters should give more attention to corn raising. We think our past agricultural policy was a mistaken one, but whether so or not, it will not do under the present situation. Labor in the South has been diminished by at least one third in amount, and increased by one third at least in cost. In the past we made cotton, shipped it to the seaboard, and sold it to the New England manufacturers. After various handlings and charges it was shipped to Boston, or elsewhere, and after more handling and charges, it went to Lowell or some other manufacturing place and converted into various styles of goods. Then was shipped back by sea, or rail, to Southern cities, and after various handlings and charges, went into the interior where the raw material came from, bought by the original producer, now the consumer, who paid all the charges and profits made by others. The folly did not stop at this point; this cotton grower grew so much cotton, that he did not get much for it, and failed to make his corn and meat, he took an inconsiderable portion of what remained after buying the high priced goods, and bought his corn and meat from the farmers of Indiana, Illinois, and Ohio, paying as in the case of the high priced cotton goods, all the charges and profits which others made, eating his bread and dear meat; and sending all his money out of his own section to some distant region. Let every planter, possible, produce all the corn he needs for his own consumption, enough to keep his stock in good condition, and to fatten the meat he needs. Make corn to eat the certain and rapid growth of Southern towns, will make a constantly increasing home market for every bushel of corn, every pound of meat you can spare for sale. The less cotton you make the better price it will command. Is it not better to make two bales than three, if two bring you as much money as three? Remember cotton is steadily falling, and steadily raising in price. The valley the Nile is planted in cotton instead of corn. India is making cotton in the place of rice. Cotton growing is on the increase in Algeria and Brazil, and from the cheapness of labor in those countries will continue to increase. There is, however, comparatively little increase in bread-making grains. The standing armies and navies of the world are all increasing, and millions of able-bodied men are turned from producers into consumers. From the war, and loss it takes twice as much food to sustain a man or a horse in the army as it does at home. It is easy to see from several causes that the price of breadstuffs and provisions generally, must for a number of years continue high.

We repeat, raise corn. White labor in the South, can much more easily and healthfully raise corn than it can cotton. You can make but little if money raising cotton at its present prospective price, with the present taxes on cotton, and the high rate of labor necessary to make and gather it. It is patriotic to raise corn. So long as annually buy scores of millions of bushels of Western corn, and scores of millions of pounds of Western meat, so long the West will prosper, pay the heavy taxes without difficulty, and so long continue its present political complexion, but let the West realize the want of a market, and a want of money, and it will rise in its majesty and adopt such a line of policy as to reduce the present crushing system of taxation.

Let every man that can spare five hundred dollars, put it into a cotton or wool factory. Let every parish and every county have one. Make a home market for your cotton, your wool, your corn, your meat. Keep the money in the country, and with it improve the lands, build up first-class educational institutions, commodious and tasteful churches, roads, improve navigation, cheapen transportation, and thus increase the general sum of wealth, comfort, and power. We repeat, though late in the season, plant and raise corn.

THE CHILD'S CORNER.

From the Children's House.

THE CUCKOO.

"Oh, what a pretty-looking bird!" said Mattie James, as she opened a new picture book. "It's a cuckoo."

"Pretty is that pretty does," was her mother's answer, on hearing the name of the bird.

"Why do you say that, mother? Does not the cuckoo behave well?"

"Not by any means. The fact is, the cuckoo is one of the meanest and most selfish of all the birds, except birds of prey, which don't pretend to be anything but greedy and cruel."

"I'm sorry to hear that," said Mattie. "What does the cuckoo do that is so bad? I thought it was such a nice bird, and that people were always pleased in England when they heard its voice in the woods or fields, singing 'Cuckoo! cuckoo!'"

"They were pleased because when they heard the cuckoo's note they knew that spring was coming."

"Why so?"

"There are birds that fly away to warm southern countries as soon as winter sets in, and come back again in the spring, and snicker to lay their eggs and hatch their young. And the cuckoo is one of these migratory birds, as they are called. So, when he is heard singing, every one thinks of the coming season of leaves and blossoms. That is why his note give so much pleasure."

"But cuckoos misbehave, you say. Are mean and selfish birds."

"You will think so when I tell you what they do, as well as what they don't do. In the first place, they don't build nests."

"Why, I never heard of such a thing, mother!" said Mattie. "Do they lay eggs right on the ground?"

"Oh, no; Mrs. Cuckoo knows a great deal better than that. Lazy people are very shrewd sometimes, and understand how to make others work for them. She looks around for the nest of a blackbird or hedge-sparrow, or yellow hammer, or a wig-tail—she is not at all particular as to which—and when the mother is away, lays eggs in these nests and leaves them to be hatched with the eggs of strange birds, never caring what becomes of her little ones. Now what do you think of that for a mother-bird?"

"Oh! it's mean as mean can be! I'm ashamed of her," answered Mattie. "But what do the other birds about it?"

"They generally behave kindly, and hatch out Mrs. Cuckoo's eggs for her."

"Which speaks well for them," said Mattie. "And I suppose the young cuckoos are grateful for this care and kindness."

"Not they, the young wretches! Cuckoo nature is bad from the beginning. For the tender care they receive, they reward Mrs. Blackbird, or Mrs. Wig-tail, by throwing her little ones out of the nest as soon as they are strong enough to do it; and they grow faster than the other young birds. If there happens to be eggs in the nest when a young cuckoo gets out of its shell, under them goes its head and shoulders and over the edge of the nest go the beautiful eggs to be broken on the ground!"

"I wouldn't have believed such a thing of any bird!" said Mattie, with a flush of indignation in her face. "It's the meanest and cruellest thing I ever heard of."

"Bad enough and cruel enough," answered her mother; "and I wish we'd something better to tell of cuckoo; but I've never learned of his having any redeeming qualities. Get from the library Mrs. Howitt's Poem's and we'll see what she says. If there's any good in him she's found it out."

The book was brought, and turning to "Birds and Flowers, and other Country Things," Mrs. James read this about

THE CUCKOO.

"Pee! pee! pee!" says the merry Pee-bird; And as soon as the children hear it, "The cuckoo's a-come," they say, "for I heard."

Up in his tree the merry Pee-bird, And he'll come in three days, or near it! The days go on, one, two, three; And the little bird singeth "pee! pee! pee!" Then on the morrow, 'tis very true, They hear the note of the old cuckoo; Up in the elm-tree, through the day, Just as in yore years, shouteth away: "Cuckoo!" the cuckoo doth cry, And the little boys mock him as they go by.

The wood-pecker laughs to hear the strain, And says "the old fellow's come back again; He sitteth again on the very same tree, And he talks to himself again—he! he! he!" The stock doves together begin to coo: "When they hear the voice of the old cuckoo; 'Ho! ho!' say they, 'he did not find Those far-away countries quite to his mind, So he's come again to see what he can do With sucking the small bird's eggs, coo—coo!" The black-bird, and thrush, and lark, and cuckoo, They sing altogether, the cuckoo to mock; "What want we with him? Let him stay—over sea!"

Sings the bold, plump seed-sparrow. "Want him? not we!" "Cuckoo!" the cuckoo shouts still, "I care not for you, let you have as you will." "Cuckoo!" the cuckoo doth cry, And the little boys mock him as they go by.

"Hark! hark!" sings the chaffinch. "Hark! hark!" says the lark. And the white throats and hootings all twitter "hark! hark!"

The wren and the hedge-sparrow hear it anon, And "hark! hark!" in a moment shouts every one.

"Hark! hark! that's the cuckoo there, shouting amain!"

"Bless our lives! why that egg-sucker's come back again!"

"Cuckoo!" the cuckoo shouts still, "I shall taste of your eggs, let you have as you will!"

"Cuckoo!" the cuckoo doth cry, And the little boys mock him as they go by.

The water hen hears it, the rail and the snail, And they say,—"Why on earth there's a pretty do!"

Sure the cuckoo's come back, what else can be the matter?

The pyes and the jays are all making a clatter! "Hark! hark!" says the wood-cock, "I hear him too, Shouting loudly as ever, the self-same cuckoo!"

"Well, well," says the wild duck, "what is it to us; I've no spite 'gainst the cuckoo, why make such a fuss?"

Let him shout as he listeth—he comes over sea— And his French may be French, tis no matter to me;

I have no spite against him, my soul's not so narrow, I leave all such whims to tomtit and sparrow!"

"Cuckoo!" the cuckoo shouts still, "You may all hold your peace, I shall do as I will!"

"Cuckoo!" the cuckoo doth cry, And the little boys mock him as they go by.

Mattie listened, with her eyes on her mother's face, and then said, laughing,

"I don't think any more of him, the saucy, impudent fellow!"

THE YOUNG COUNT.

BY ROSA PALMER.

LISTEN, dear children, and I will tell you a story of a little German boy. In one of the chambers of a great house in Saxony, he sits writing a letter. He is not yet ten years old; but his face is glowing with busy thought. What can he be writing about, and to whom will he direct the letter that he pens with such careful fingers, stopping every little while to think again before adding another word? It is all finished now, and the young writer has signed his name—Lewie. Then, after folding the paper, he writes upon the outside the name of Jesus Christ!

A letter to Jesus Christ? and what will the boy do with it? See, he goes to the open window, looks up to the blue sky, and with a trusting smile drops the letter, and watches it as it falls slowly, and at last rests upon the green grass. Then he stands waiting, with a wishful, patient look. He hopes the Saviour may sometime find his letter and answer it. You will think this little Lewie did not know much about his Saviour and yours. But he showed a desire to know more. Let me tell you how that desire was gratified, how his childish letter was at last answered.

One day, while still a boy, he visited a gallery of paintings, where he saw one of Jesus, as we see him in the twenty-seventh chapter of Matthew, on the cross, bruised and wounded for our transgressions, bleeding from those stripes by which we are healed, and pale with agony, yet having in his face a look of infinite love. Beneath the picture were these words: "Behold what I have done for you! And you! what have you done for me?" This picture and these words were not forgotten by the young Count of Zinzendorf. While in college, and busy with the studies of his course, he applied himself without any direction or aid to the study of theology also, fully resolved to become a minister of the gospel. And such he was for many years—minister, missionary, and reformer. At laboring successfully for Christ in Europe, he spent two years in this country, teaching the Indians in a part of Pennsylvania that was then a wilderness. Before he died, his pupils and followers had established Christian homes and churches among "Greenland's icy mountains," and earned for the Moravians the praise and sympathy of all other Christian workers. Now, when you think of Zinzendorf and his glorious life, remember the picture and the question that gave to his life its first great impulse. What have you done for the Saviour? Be sure he has a work for you. That is one reason why he calls you to him. Let your daily prayer hereafter be, Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?—Sabbath at Home.

MENDING BROKEN VESSELS; GEMENT.

To half a pint of milk put a sufficient quantity of vinegar in order to curdle it; separate the curd from the whey, and mix the whey with the whites of four eggs, beating the whole well together; when mixed, add a little quicklime through a sieve until it acquires the consistency of a paste. With this cement broken vessels or cracks can be repaired; it dries quickly, and resists the action of fire and water.

SCIENTIFIC.

From the Scientific American.

Science as the Latest Parisian Fashion.

The Emperor and Empress of France and the whole imperial court are now setting a good example, which will be followed by all Paris, and consequently by all the fashionable world, namely, to take an interest in scientific lectures and experiments. Hitherto science had only been popularized, but not made fashionable, and any move to interest the self-styled "cream of society" in it, and prove to them that there is more enjoyment in natural philosophy, chemistry, etc., than in balls, parties, etc., is a move in the right direction, because of the necessary influence exerted on society by the wealthy. To give our readers an idea of what is going on in this respect in Paris, we subjoin an abbreviated translation of an account found in one of the latest Parisian journals, about the doings of the French court.

"It is nine o'clock p.m. There is no reception, ball, or any other brilliant party at the palace of the Tuilleries; the Emperor has beside his court only a limited number of guests. The passers by, looking at the dark edifice, wonder what is going on now. Well, the imperial court attends the scientific lectures."

A few evenings ago M. Leverrier lectured on astronomy; to-night M. Moigno lectures on electricity. During day batteries, coils, electric and magnetic machines were brought to the palace; the guards looked with surprise at them, but science is penetrating everywhere. In the yard Mr. Duboseq had arranged a battery of fifty Bunsen's elements, of which the wires were attached to the machines placed in the salle du trone. The usual lights were extinguished, and only the electric lamp shone brightly. M. Moigno, surrounded by an illustrious staff of all the celebrated electricians of Paris, threw a ray of light on a screen, and after some general explanations, decomposed it into the colors of the rainbow, and then made to appear in these rays the peculiar lines lately discovered by Bunsen, produced by the combustion of different metals; the three green lines of copper, the two brilliant green lines of silver, the red and violet lines of zinc, etc.

"Then the most powerful electric machine in the world, constructed by Keppel, was put in operation. In a few turns of the disk the enormous brass globes serving as conductors were charged, and torrents of flashes of lightning went zigzag through the air to a distance of more than two feet.

"The new electric machine of Holz, perfected by Bertsch, was put in operation by the last named. The attention of the Emperor was strongly attracted by this instrument; he came nearer to speak to the inventor; the young prince followed him, and soon the whole court was mixed with the operators, somewhat frightening the Empress when her little son handled the coils and Leyden jars, and received an unexpected shock. [Served him right.]

"Mr. Achard then explained the action of his electric warning signal for railroads, one of the best among the two thousand thus far invented. Mr. Poitevin put his electro-magnetic motor in operation. The Geissler's tubes were exhibited, which become luminous by electric currents, and exhibit different colors, according to the chemical composition of the glass and the rarefied vapors contained in them. The name of Napoleon III. appeared in this way in streaks of colored fire, and by turning a disk to which a set of such tubes were attached, a most beautiful pyrotechnic sun was obtained, called the star of Cassiot. After some other experiments, the ladies of the court desired to take the shock; they joined hands, formed a circle, and half crying and half laughing, they bravely took the discharge of some minor electric apparatus."

A NEW ELECTRICAL LIGHT—WONDERFUL DISCOVERY.—Mr. H. Wilde, of Liverpool, has brought out a new discovery in electricity during the past year, which is described as exceedingly brilliant and important. He has found a method of producing an electricity in quantities, and of an intensity hitherto unknown, by the action of feeble electrical currents upon powerful magnets. His apparatus consists of six permanent magnets weighing only a pound each, a 10 inch electro-magnetic machine, having an electro-magnet weighing three pounds (which accumulates and retains the developed electricity on the same principle as an insulated submarine cable or the Leyden jar), and an armature revolving within an iron cylinder at the rate of 1500 turns a minute. The cylinder is about a foot long, and has a bore of 2½ inches; the armature which plays within it, not touching the sides, is coiled about with insulated copper wire. It is from the armature, when the different parts of the apparatus have been connected and put into operation, that the electricity is evolved and the effects are produced.

This machinery evolves a light which rivals the sun in its dazzling luminousness, and surpasses that orb in taking photographs. At a distance of a quarter of a mile it throws shadows from the flames of a street lamp upon a wall. Two photographers in England have set up the machine in their shops and now do all the copying and enlarging by the new electric light at night. The heating power of the flame is so intense that it melts seven feet of 16 iron wire and heats to a red heat twenty-one feet of the same wire in an instant. The cost of the apparatus is small, the waste of materials trifling, and the expense of working light. For lighting streets, for light-houses and for illuminating public buildings, the new discovery is far superior to gas, and there are probably various other purposes besides those already indicated, to which it may be devoted, if its properties are truthfully described.

ABOUT POON.—An English physician (Dr. Thudichum) asserts that Liebig's extract of meat lacks the essential properties of nutriment. It contains the elements required in very small proportion and in an oxidized state, and is simply a stimulant, a strong beef tea, when prepared for swallowing. Of the 25 per cent. solid substance contained in meat, four fifths are insoluble in water or become so by boiling, allowing only one fifth of the solid parts, or five per cent. of the whole, to be saved in the extract. He thinks that after eggs, the nearest substitute for meat is Indian corn and other kinds of seed, beans, peas, etc., when grown in southern climates. Northern grown beans are not approved, and this kind of food always requires peculiarly careful preparation to be digestible. Vegetable food requires much digestion, and its use demands and creates an increase of the stomach, which is visible in well-fed vegetarians, and in the lengthening of the intestine of the domestic cat from the proportions of the wild state, in consequence of changing its diet from flesh exclusively to bread and potatoes.—Scienc. Am.

IMITATIONS OF GOLD.—Oreide, the beautiful alloy resembling gold, manufactured in Waterbury, Conn., is a French discovery, and consists of pure copper 100 parts; zinc, or (preferably) tin, 17 parts; magnesia, 6 parts; sal ammoniac 3 6 parts; quicklime, 1 8 parts; tartar of commerce, 9 parts. The copper is first melted, then the magnesia, sal ammoniac, lime, and tartar in powder, are added little by little, briskly stirring for about half an hour, so as to mix thoroughly; after which zinc is thrown on the surface in small grains, stirring it until entirely fused; the crucible is then covered, and the fusion maintained for about thirty-five minutes, when the dross is skimmed off, and the alloy ready for use. It can be cast, rolled, drawn, stamped, chased, beaten into a powder or leaves, and none but excellent judges can distinguish it from gold. Another beautiful alloy rivaling the color of gold, is obtained with 90 per cent. copper and 10 per cent. aluminium, which must be perfectly pure, of the best quality, and in exact proportion. It is little affected by the atmosphere, and is strong, malleable, and homogeneous in structure.—Scienc. Am.

SKELETON LEAVES.—The following has been communicated to the Botanical Society of Edinburgh:—

"A solution of caustic soda is made by dissolving 3 oz. of washing soda in two pints of boiling water, and adding 1½ oz. of quick lime, previously slacked; boil for ten minutes, decant the clear solution and bring it to the boil. During ebullition add the leaves; boil briskly for some time—say an hour, occasionally adding hot water to supply the place of that lost by evaporation. Take out a leaf and put into a vessel of water, rub it between the fingers under the water. If the epidermis and parenchyma separate easily, the rest of the leaves may be removed from the solution, and treated in the same way; but if not, then the boiling must be continued for some time longer. To bleach the skeletons, mix about a drachm of the chloride of lime with a pint of water, adding sufficient acetic acid to liberate the chlorine. Steep the leaves in this till they are whitened (about ten minutes), taking care not to let them stay in too long, otherwise they are apt to become brittle. Put them into clean water, and float them out on pieces of paper. Lastly, remove them from the paper before they are quite dry, and place them in a book or botanical press."—Dr. G. Dickson.

BRITISH HONDURAS.

Having been absent about two months, and just returned on the "Trade Wind," (only four days at sea) from Belize to New Orleans, we stop a few moments to make a brief statement, and promise a full report very soon.

Being introduced by Mr. J. M. P. as representing numbers of Southern families, we were honored with welcome reception by His Excellency, the Governor of Honduras, and all the prominent citizens of Belize, who universally expressed the warmest sympathy for our unfortunate Confederate people, and kindly assured us of their earnest desire that we would make our homes among them and develop the resources of the Colony, which we found vast indeed.

We have been most assiduously and laboriously engaged for the last six weeks exploring the country and investigating its resources. And by means of steamboat, row-boats and oarsmen, and guides with machetes, which were generously put at our command by those noble people, we have been enabled to see and learn as much of the country and its resources in that length of time as we could have acquired in six months without such facilities.

And now we are happy in being able to say to our Southern friends, the climate of Honduras is pleasant and healthy; the soil is very rich, easily cleared, and accessible; the productions are very abundant and valuable; and furthermore, the lands are now in our hands for Colonization on very easy terms without any speculation whatever.

The Colonial Government, under British protection, is very mild but efficient—good order and harmony prevail universally; and person and property are perfectly safe every where.

We concur in the opinion, and give it as our honest conviction that, British Honduras is the best country to which our impoverished Confederate people can emigrate, to enjoy peace, and repair their ruined fortunes. And the Colony has chartered the steamship "Trade Wind" to make regular monthly voyages between New Orleans and Belize especially to accommodate Southern immigrants.

In a few days we will publish our report in detail, which we hope will be satisfactory to all who would make good citizens there.

DISTRICT MEETING

Of the New Orleans District, Louisiana Conference, for 1867.

Meeting met in the basement of the Orangetree street Church, April 27th, at 10 A. M. The meeting was called to order, and opened with religious exercises by the Presiding Elder of the District, Dr. J. C. Keener, who occupied the chair and presided over the deliberations of the body.

Linus Parker was, on motion, elected Secretary.

Members were present from the several churches at the opening of the meeting, as follows:

Carondelet street—J. B. Walker, pastor;

Dr. B. H. Moss, T. K. Price, J. H. Dun-

nicke, and Daniel Tillotson.

Felicity street—Linus Parker, pastor;

Wm. H. Dameron, W. H. Foster, Philip

Halloran.

Moreau street—R. J. Harp, pastor; R.

J. Robertson.

Dryades German Church—J. A. B.

Ahrens, pastor; Myers.

Cropps St. Church—Jacob Ueber, pastor.

Lafayette and Carrollton German Church

—John Parly, pastor.

Baton Rouge—C. W. Carter, pastor;

J. O. Fuqua, W. H. N. Magruder.

Jefferson City—C. F. Evans, pastor.

Louisiana Avenue—J. C. Miller, pastor;

Richard Keen.

Thibodaux Circuit—P. M. Goodwyn,

pastor.

On motion the following committees

were constituted, and the committee-men were appointed by the chair.

1. On Church Extension and Finances.—J. O. Fuqua, Dr. B. H. Moss, L. Parker, C. W. Carter.

2. On Missions, Periodicals, and relief of the Poor.—W. H. Dameron, W. S. Mount, P. M. Goodwyn, R. J. Harp.

3. Schools—Sabbath and Literary.—W. H. Foster, W. H. N. Magruder, R. L. Walker, J. A. B. Ahrens.

4. On the Spiritual Condition of the Church.—J. B. Walker, J. C. Miller, T. K. Price, R. L. Robertson.

The chair called for pastoral reports. Written reports were presented and read from the pastors of all the churches, except Plaquemine and Gros Tete, which was represented by the Presiding Elder of the District. The reports were, on motion referred to the several committees.

W. H. Foster, general Superintendent of Sabbath Schools of the District, presented his report, embracing reports from several schools, which was referred to the Committee on Schools.

Dr. Keener, P. E., read an address to the meeting on the various interests of the Church in the bounds of the District, which was respectfully referred to the committee.

L. Parker offered the following resolutions which were adopted:

Resolved, That in the opinion of this District Meeting, a German Edition of our Discipline is highly desirable and necessary.

Resolved, That J. A. B. Ahrens be requested to translate our Discipline into the German, and that he furnish Dr. Redford, the Book Agent, with the same, for publication.

On motion the meeting adjourned till 7 1/2 o'clock P. M.

Benediction by the Chairman.

NIGHT SESSION.

Met pursuant to adjournment at 7 1/2 P. M. Dr. Keener, P. E., in the Chair. Opened with religious services by Rev. Lewis A. Reed.

The minutes of the morning session were read and approved.

The report of J. O. Fuqua, Chairman of Committee on Church extension and finances, was read and adopted with the following recommendations and resolutions:

1. That the debts on our churches be paid before we undertake to build others; and that the members of this meeting will make an earnest and united effort to raise the amount necessary to pay the debt of the church at Baton Rouge.

2. That for extending our churches we recommend the establishment of Sabbath-schools, and the employment of missionaries in the home work.

3. That for the purpose of meeting the current expenses of the churches, we believe the plan of assessing the members, by the Board of Stewards, to be the most successful; and we recommend the general adoption of this plan to our boards of stewards.

W. H. Dameron, Chairman of Committee on Missions, Church Publications, and the relief of the Poor, presented his report, recommending:

1. Special attention to the religious wants of the colored people, and the fostering of domestic missions in the city of New Orleans.

2. That the claims of the New Orleans Christian Advocate be brought more prominently to the notice of the public; also the claims of the HOME MONTHLY and of the SUNDAY SCHOOL VISITOR; and that some action be taken for the publication of a German paper, and for the publishing of our Discipline and Hymn Book in German.

3. In ministering to the poor of our congregation we recommend that regular collections be taken, and that, wherever practicable, a number of the brethren and sisters be appointed to seek out the afflicted and destitute, and provide for their relief.

The report was adopted.

Rev. J. A. B. Ahrens presented a report from the Committee on Schools, which, with the following resolutions, was adopted:

1. Resolved, That the German preachers of our Church be advised to establish in their several charges good elementary day-schools, the teachers of which shall be appointed by the Quarterly Conference, and shall be under the immediate control of the ministers in charge.

2. Resolved, That the New Orleans District Meeting earnestly recommend and advise the establishment of Methodist male and female schools; and that we will give our aid and influence in the establishment and maintenance of said schools.

On motion, a Committee of three, consisting of Dr. J. C. Keener, Prof. J. C. Miller, and Richard Jones, was appointed, to carry out the objects and purposes of the above resolution.

Dr. Walker, Chairman of Committee on the Spiritual Condition of the Church, presented his report, which, with the following statements and resolutions, was read and adopted:

1. Thirteen churches have presented reports. Of these, seven churches report that their membership is increasing. Ten of these churches have prayer and class-meetings. At no one is the average attendance on these meetings more than from one third to one half the membership. We gather from the pastoral reports that there are 1074 communicants in the New Orleans District; of these 340, or about one third of the whole, attend the social meetings of the Church.

2. Resolved, That the members of the New Orleans District Meeting continue to cherish the highest appreciation of the social meetings of the Church, to-wit: class meetings, prayer meetings, the Church meetings, and the love feasts.

3. Resolved, That the members of this District Meeting, both laymen and ministers, will continue to exert all legitimate influence to promote an increased interest in, and a more general attendance upon, these means of grace.

Dr. B. H. Moss, on behalf of the district stewards, presented a report determining the allowance of the Presiding Elder, and the apportionment of said allowance to the several churches in the bounds of the district.

Also recommending that, inasmuch as the election of lay representatives to the ensuing Annual Conference, is devolved upon the district stewards, each Quarterly Conference should nominate one representative by ballot, from which the district stewards shall elect four representatives by ballot, at a meeting to be held previous to the next Annual Conference. The report was adopted. The Presiding Elder was requested to place his address in the hands of the Secretary, to be published in the ADVOCATE, along with the proceedings of this District Meeting. After singing and prayer the meeting adjourned. LEWIS PARKER, Sec'y.

NEW ORLEANS, April 27, 1867.

DEAR BRETHREN—

1. The object of this District Meeting is to introduce some of you to the new position which the recent legislation of the General Conference and Annual Conference of our Church has assigned to her laymen: that you may enter at once upon a share of those privileges and burdens which heretofore have been the exclusive property of itinerant preachers.

2. We experience a pure Christian pleasure in welcoming you to our counsels, and anxieties, to the high trust and holy labors to which you are now called by the Church of God. And may this be the beginning of the most glorious period of her history, the hour in which those born in her house and carefully trained, have come to their majority and become the leaders and nobles of Israel! "Pillars in the temple of God, to go no more out."

3. The field of care and the ripened harvest which immediately presents itself to your attention in this city and in this district, is enough to call to highest action all your charity, all your faith, and all the strength that you have consecrated to the service of God. Great cities have always been the centers from which the Holy Spirit has diffused the truth. Wisdom "uttereth her voice in the streets; she crieth in the chief place of concourse, in the openings of the gates: in the city she uttereth her words." Jerusalem, Rome, Antioch, Athens, Ephesus, and Corinth were the great centers selected by the Saviour and His Apostles in which was to be developed and illustrated the Gospel of the Son of God. From these crowded marts the Spirit could send forth to many surrounding countries men of different languages, who had in one hour heard the truth, who, coming there for traffic and gold, were sent away with gifts more precious than rubies. The great adversary fortifies himself in the capitals of the world, and there holds his principal court. The inherent antagonism between truth and error, the Kingdom of God's Son, and that of Darkness, must join issue where men are thickest, and here the battle must ultimately be decided. Babylon, with all her merchandise, and merchants, and ship masters, great stores of gold and precious stones, and ivory, and fine linen, and odors, must be overthrown. "Alas! alas! that great city, wherein were made rich all that had ships in the sea, by reason of her costliness! for in one hour is she made desolate." It is in these proud places that the Empire of Sin will perish.

Wesley began his great work not in the fields, but in the densest part of London. Methodism has succeeded everywhere in this country, but her most effective agencies radiate from the chief towns and cities.

We know of no greater prospective center of trade and population and commerce than this city and this delta, into whose lap there flows, by the law of currents, the wealth of the valley of the longest river in the world. To this point, no matter what may be the policy or the revolutions of this generation, myriads of men will resort. And doubtless to this point His eyes are turned, who still regards with boundless solicitude the fortunes of the human family, who was found teaching daily in houses among multitudes, packed so "that there was no room to receive them, no, not so much as about the door."

4. What can be done to extend Methodism in this city? We present this to you as a question for your present earnest consideration. Here the Catholic Church has reared the most stately and durable piles, and is contemplating yet greater monuments of her industry and her devotion to the worship of Mary, and those mysterious forms which she boldly offers men instead of the inspired word, the blood of the Covenant, and the life of the Holy Spirit.

All that our own Church needs to directly double its strength here, is a greater number of houses of worship. With one or two such edifices as would be worthy of the present and the future of this city, in addition to those we now have, Methodism would fairly enter upon her great mission in the South-west. By what means shall these be secured? What policy shall be adopted for the constant and certain supply of Methodist churches commensurate with the growing wants of this Metropolis?

5. The financial condition of the several churches in this district is the next point which we call your attention to. It is important that all our churches be relieved of debt. Their spiritual welfare, and our own strength of position, is involved in it. Several of our churches have received aid during the past year. But we have two churches that are seriously embarrassed, and one of the finest in the district we are in danger of losing from debt. The report of the trustees of these churches will be presented for your consideration.

6. The support of the ministry is difficult, accidental and inadequate, except at two prominent points. Other churches seem to provide for their own with greater ease than we do. How shall the wear and friction of raising the amount necessary to pay the current expenses of the charges be lessened? and the whole system of ministerial support be made permanently effective?

7. The great enterprises which bind the Church together into one body next claim our notice.

The enterprise of sending the Gospel to the heathen, and to those at home who are either unwilling or unable to pay for it.

That of supplying the people with the Holy Scriptures, and reaching with the word of exhortation and comfort those who never enter places of worship.

That of aiding the poor, the widow, and the orphan, that our people may be trained to works of mercy, without which they can not reasonably expect the blessing of Him who has said, "If ye do it to one of these, ye have done it to me."

The preparing and sending forth good books and papers for the enlightenment and instruction of our own people, and of those who are wholly ignorant of the peculiar doctrines of Wesley.

8. The condition of the Sabbath-schools in the district will be duly reported to you, and we present the whole subject of Sabbath-school instruction, as susceptible of great improvement. The time spent upon the children is insufficient. Their attendance upon preaching is not generally secured. The great objects of indoctrinating them in the principles and grounds of Methodism, and of introducing them to an experimental knowledge of Christ, are very imperfectly attained. Our schools on a Sabbath day, the training of our children, are vital and essential to the existence of the churches. Not only the spirituality, but the action of the Church to a great extent takes its rise here and receives its future impulse. As is the Sabbath-school so will be the Church.

9. The scholastic education of the young is closely connected with this department of church enterprise. We have one or two excellent schools in the district which are a strength and a credit to Methodism. We believe the time is come for at least encouraging the establishment of a female and a male high-school in this city. The facilities afforded here for learning music, the French, Spanish, and Italian languages induce parents to send their daughters and sons to this point for completing their education, and they find their way into Catholic, Episcopal, and other schools, and through them into other church communions. The instinct and the duty of our people is to train the children whom God has given them so that they may transmit not only their names, but their faith. There is no better point in Southern Methodism for a female college, and a Methodist male high-school, such as will prepare young men for college.

10. In conclusion, we earnestly submit that above all else what we need is the ancient fire. With lay representation, church meetings, houses, schools, and money we mainly want a spiritual Christianity. Greater holiness will secure all these. By spirituality alone our Church is what she is. Methodism has no forms essential to her existence. She presents nothing calculated to attract the people or likely to secure their favor, saving the preaching of the Gospel as it is in Christ Jesus; as a Gospel of convicting and converting power. Her ministers, to be effectual, must be men full of the Spirit of the Master. Each member of the Church constantly needs instruction, encouragement, and direction in his spiritual life, to be addressed personally and to be inquired of how his soul prospers. This labor of love can not be performed wholly by the minister. Often neither the fit occasion nor the time is afforded for this in his pastoral visits. The only exact opportunity for this Christian counsel and sympathy is to be found in the class-meeting. It is probable that the suspension of the disciplinary enforcement of this institution will enable the Church to take an impartial view of its practical worth to Methodism. We need full restoration of all the machinery of Methodism. Protracted meetings, camp meetings, the altar, the love-feast, and the class room have been identified with the growth of our Church and her establishment in this country. It is doubtful if there can be found any substitution for these venerable instrumentalities, honored of God, and blessed, as they have been, to the edification and salvation of myriads of great souls. They constitute a strong public declaration of the doctrines of justification by faith in the blood of Christ alone, and in the new life, as essential to life eternal. They do openly acknowledge the direct, the present, and the powerful agency of the Holy Spirit in the salvation of men. By them the people not only hear, but see in what the Church believes.

The doctrine of holiness of heart should be urged upon our people, that they may have a better resurrection. A life of active Godliness should be held up to them as the absolute and necessary condition of maintaining spiritual life.

May God enlighten us all, and increase our zeal in His house, and enable us to advance the Kingdom of His dear Son!

FROM OTHER CHURCHES.

ENGLAND.—The Protestant party in the Establishment, says the English Independent, have at last broken ground. They have had a few meetings and lectures. They are forcing on a prosecution against the St. Alban's ritualists; and Lord Shaftesbury has introduced a bill to make "Sacrificial garments" illegal. His Lordship is of the opinion that lighted candles and incense-burning are so plainly illegal that they can be put down by the action of the courts; but the vestment question is so doubtful that nothing but an act of Parliament will suffice to suppress the use of albs, copes, and chasubles. He proposes, therefore, to make the 58th canon, which prescribes that "every minister saying the public prayers, or ministering the sacrament or other rites of the church, shall wear a decent and comely surplice with sleeves," part of the statute law. If one of the canons is to be put on the statute-book, why not all of them? Then every clergyman in the Establishment would be obliged every Sabbath to denounce by name every papist, every dissenter, and every excommunicated person in his parish.

A correspondent of the Presbyterian says:—"Ritualists are specially bitter and abusive in their chief weekly organ, the Church Times. Its editor is Mr. Lee, 'priest,' who made himself so offensive, and went to such extremes in the city of Aberdeen, that the local Bishop put down his Romanizing performances, and compelled him to leave altogether. He is clever, unscrupulous, and coarse; and yet, if set face to face before any of the men whom he maligns and insults, he would be as dwarfed in intellect and moral dignity, as he is physically in stature."

The Jewish Chronicle says the legitimate development of Protestantism is Rationalism on the one hand, and Ritualism on the other. A writer in the Evangelical Christendom says:—"The people and Parliament of England are at heart Protestant, but the machinery of Parliament is far too complicated and far too rude to deal with so subtle a problem as the exposure and expulsion of that Popery, which lurks in the Church of England, and of which Ritualism is partly the symbol, partly the mask. The Papists of the Church are resolute.—They believe in their error wholly, and will run all risks for its sake. The Protestant clergy must imitate them in thoroughness, and declare that one church cannot harbor popery and protestantism but must be either popish or protestant."

A remarkable revival is reported from the Scilly Islands, where one hundred and fifty persons, or one-tenth of the entire population, have professed conversion during the past few weeks. The movement appears to have commenced with the efforts of some Wesleyan prayer-leaders, whose visits to sick persons in various villages were instrumental in the awakening of others. Subsequently the work extended to St. Mary's, where scores have been added to the Wesleyan church, the new converts comprising persons in all classes of society.

The Society of Friends in England, which has of late years been rather fading away, until their present membership in England is only about 15,000, is reviving. They have just established a new periodical, entitled "The Friends' Examiner, a Religious, Social and Miscellaneous Review."

For the N. O. Christian Advocate.

A SERMON ON EXCOMMUNICATION.

I pray thee have me excommunicated. Mark v. 18.

CONCLUDED FROM OUR LAST.

3. The hardness and insincerity of the times. "With the breaking up of a long established system of labor, a universal derangement has ensued; domestic help is both uncertain and unsatisfactory. The unusual number of idlers who refuse to labor but must nevertheless subsist, renders insecure household effects in the absence of the proprietors. The time required to prepare the meals and the necessity of taking care of what little the war has left us renders it impossible for us to attend church and prayer-meetings." This excuse may awaken sympathy from its general application. Nevertheless when offered by a Christian man, or woman, it is grossly inconsistent. Who is served by all this? Not the Lord, surely, but yourself; and no one has discovered a transformation by which selfishness can be made a Christian virtue. What a glorious list of names could be arrayed against this selfish theory! Names of Christian women charged with the heaviest household duties, besides the care of a numerous family, whose active, devoted lives adorned the doctrines of Christ their Saviour. Nor have the race of such women altogether passed away. The church is still blessed with many such. What is the history of the Church? but an animated record of perseverance under difficulties—"faint yet pursuing?" It shows that under the inspiration of religious devotion the art of managing reached its highest excellence. It traces zeal, taxed on every side, yet never consumed;—it bears testimony to a style of activity that never despaired thought often baffled. If as our excuses assert, our calling is impracticable in the scheme of its duties; how came both men and women to achieve such success under its discipline?—a success that has made them models in every line of business, and examples in every station of life—and what is it that gives such worth to their examples? but the severest trials of their principles, of their feelings, of their intelligence: trials that reached their catastrophe in imprisonment, in exile, in infamous punishments, in martyrdom. Having suggested the inconsistencies of apologies, we shall see

II. That the responsibility of the Christian is not lessened by a desire to be excused from duty. The responsibility must remain in full force while the requirements of the gospel remain unchanged.—These requirements regard the faith, the dispositions, and the habits. "Without faith it is impossible to please God." There are certain requisites which spring from this first condition,—faith must be purified, and faith must be nurtured. Faith is purified by the light of revelation, hence, even to the Christian, the necessity of a preached gospel.—Rightly understood the call of sinners to repentance is not more the duty of the preacher than the edification of the Church of God in holiness. Protestantism has given the world an open gospel—for this it has all authority; but it has no warrant to excuse any one from attendance upon a preached gospel.—The necessity for purification under which faith labors is traceable, both to the constitution of the mind, and the nature and end of revelation. A scheme so vast cannot be embraced in one conception, and successive conceptions often introduce confusion. The different theologies are in point as proof.—No one can excuse himself from this institution of the Saviour without incurring consequences that reach much farther than the grasp of ordinary understandings.

But faith requires nurturing also. An opportunity for this is provided for in the fellowship of saints. "Faith begets faith," is a saying that will prove true however far it is pressed. Among the few singular things in this life, this one is the most striking. The uniformity of experience is unbroken by a single exception. So strong are the claims, and so indispensable the fellowship of saints: and it is perhaps its solitary use in the economy of redemption. The facts of the gospel history as personally seen, and the doctrines of Christ, heard from his own lips—were communicated by eye and ear witnesses, says the Apostle John, that we might share their fellowship.—The congregation of the Lord became in their turn witnesses to these blessed truths, creating a means of growth not to be found elsewhere, vivifying the truth by a living testimony to its power. No one who has it in his heart to endeavor to save his soul can dispense with the fellowship of saints.

But faith has its own expression also. Worship.—Faith gives a new sense to the soul, it affords a powerful means for impressing the soul, and it serves the soul as memory does the mind:—its sense is the knowledge of God, its impression gratitude, its memory the infinite goodness of God.—These are the elements that enter into the worship of faith, and in the assembly is its chosen place. How barren the soul must be, that finds no urgent occasion within, to hail with joy the opening of a Sabbath morn—that does not meet with gladness the saints who come together to pray and praise. The dispositions. Christ stands openly before us an example of what our dispositions may be. Like him, every inclination should find its attraction in the Father's love, and holiness. We can never, no not for a moment, be excused from love to our God. There should be such a constant sense of divine goodness filling the soul, as to convert it into a like nature: such a feeling of his mercy, and love, as to create an ardent desire to become merciful and loving.—What madness, what infidelity, to suppose that Christ, the loving obedient Son, would excuse us from the service of his Father—would relax a single claim of his Father's in deference to any consideration which we could draw from our circumstances. "A merciful high Priest" he is, "and touched by every feeling of our infirmities;" but his affections and compassions for us are under the control of a supreme love and regard for the Father. Is it not enough that he came to the dwelling place of man, that he ordered his conduct before them to settle the question, whom we must follow? He has ascended on high, and draws all men unto him—but he draws only in the way he went. He was God; but he was also man: as man he exemplified what every man imbed with his spirit may, can, must do. This direction is a necessity that his divinity attested. From the cross there is no release; with out the cross there is no hope. Up, then, with your cross. "The master is come and calleth for thee."

3. Christianity requires of the habits that they be fixed and uniform: that they yield compliance with the commandments and institutions of Christ. Nothing is left to fluctuation. Chance can find no room to play in a gospel of redemption; impulse may impart additional vigor to devotion, but cannot direct an order for Christian habits. The life, the time, and thought, of a Christian is engaged, consecrated, devoted to a faithful use of appointed means. The certainties of revelation give no occasion for experiments, and the positiveness of Christian institutions leaves nothing to seek out. The order of our walk and conversation must be before God, who will render to every man according to his works. May the Lord soon fulfill his promise concerning his flock! "I will seek that which was lost, and bring again that which was driven away, and will bind up that which was broken, and will strengthen that which was sick; I will feed them in a good pasture, and upon the high mountains of Israel shall their fold be."

From Good Words.

THE CREED OF CHRISTENDOM.

I.—THE FATHERHOOD OF GOD.

"I believe in God the Father."

NEANDER, the great German theologian, has a striking comment on the words of our Lord to the Sadducees, "As touching the resurrection of the dead, have ye not read that which was spoken unto you by God, saying, I am the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob? God is not the God of the dead but of the living." "How," he says, "could God place himself in so near a relation to individual men, and ascribe to them so high a dignity, if they were mere perishable appearances, if they had not an essence akin to his own, and destined for immortality? The living God can only be conceived as the God of the living.—And this argument, derived from the theocratic basis of the Old Testament, is founded upon a more general one, viz., the connexion between the consciousness of God and that of immortality. Man could not become conscious of God as his God, if he were not a personal spirit, divinely allied and destined for eternity, an eternal object (as an individual) of God, and thereby far above all natural and perishable beings, whose perpetuity is that of the species, not the individual."

This direct relation of man to God as a person to a person, which formed the basis of the Old Testament connection between the Divine Ruler and his chosen people, is extended to all nations of the earth in the opening words of the prayer which Christ taught for the use of his disciples in all ages and countries, "Our Father, which art in heaven." Moses, to whom God had revealed Himself at the bush as the God of Abraham, of Isaac, and of Jacob, was further commissioned to declare to Pharaoh, "Thus saith the Lord, Israel is my son, even my first born;" and in these words we may see a prophetic reference to those to whom, in a deeper and fuller sense, God would hereafter reveal Himself as their Father.

The Fatherhood of God thus primarily implies two things—the personality of God and the personality of man. No man would dream of giving the name of Father to a mere immutable law, to a mere first link in a chain of necessary phenomena, nor to the aggregate of all such phenomena put together. Our existence is in many ways dependent upon natural laws; there are natural conditions under which we breathe and move, and without which we could not continue to live for an instant; there are natural conditions under which we first came into life, and to which, in a secondary sense, we may be said to owe our physical existence; but to call any of the laws which regulate our birth and growth and nutriment, or all such laws put together, by the name of Father, is language which at once refutes itself by its own absurdity. We can have a Divine and Eternal Father, only on the supposition that there exists a Divine and Eternal Person, on whom we are dependent, not as phenomena are dependent on a natural law, which is but a general expression for these very phenomena themselves; but as creatures are dependent on their Creator, who existed before them, and distinct from them, and who called them into being by his own free personal act.

For this personality in God and man necessarily implies the free-will of God and the free-will of man.—Free-will is the one attribute which distinguishes a person from a thing. Necessary truths, necessary phenomena, whether that necessity be mathematical or physical, have nothing to do with personality. It is not my truth or yours, or any person's, that two and two make four, or that the angles of a triangle are equal to two right angles. The alternations of day and night, and summer and winter, are phenomena of nature, but they are in no sense mine. Even the necessary conditions of my own physical existence are not personal. "Surely," says Coleridge, "it would be strange language to say that I construct my heart! or that I propel the finer influences through my nerves! or that I press my brain and draw the curtains of sleep round my own eyes." Those acts only are mine for which I am responsible, as having power to do them or not to do them. Without this power I am a thing, not a person; the acts in which I take a part are mere natural phenomena; for which I am no more responsible than life is responsible for burning me, or water for wetting me.

If the personality of man, as a limited and dependent personality, implies, within those limits, free action and power to do or not to do certain acts, the personality of God, as an unlimited and independent personality, implies free action and power without limit. Though for

His own wise reasons He permits the phenomena of the universe to proceed in a regular and uninterrupted course, save in so far as, without affecting the stability of the system, they are in a limited degree under the control of man, yet the very conception of God as a Divine Person implies that this regularity and order is dependent on His will and not the result of any inherent necessity in the nature of things.—We may say, with the Psalmist, "He hath made them fast for ever and ever; he hath given them a law which shall not be broken;" but it is only by recognising the law as His gift that we can acknowledge a personal God distinct from and superior to the world.

But this relation of God to the world as its Creator and Governor is not all that is implied in the Fatherhood of God. He is indeed the Personal Creator of the world, and all that it contains; yet it is only by a strong figure of speech that we could speak of God as the Father of the heavenly bodies, or of the vegetable or brute creation.—Personality is the necessary condition of Fatherhood: if there be no personal God we can have no Father in Heaven; but it is not the only condition. The whole world is dependent upon God for its existence; but He is a Father only to those who can be conscious of the dependence. It is only in so far as we ourselves are persons that we can be conscious of our relation to a personal God: it is only through the consciousness of our own personality that we can obtain to any faint representation of the higher personality of God; that we can own Him as our Father and look upon ourselves as His children. The consciousness on our part of this relation involves two principal points: a sense of natural dependence upon God, and a sense of moral duty towards Him. Just as the parent is first known to the child as the person on whom his natural welfare is immediately dependent, by whom his natural wants are supplied, who is able to grant his requests and to give him such things as are needful, so man learns to look on God as the Being on whom he is ultimately dependent for his existence and welfare, who as a Person is capable of showing favor to those dependent upon Him, and as a Person can be regarded with feelings of love, and reverence, and gratitude, and trust, and fear. This is the first characteristic of our consciousness of the Fatherhood of God: its natural expression is the language of prayer: the natural impulse to this expression is the conviction that God can hear and answer prayer.

But further: the parent is made known to the child, not merely as a benefactor, but as a moral governor. The dormant sense of right and wrong is first awakened into consciousness by the parent's commands and prohibitions. Imperfectly awakened, no doubt; right implies something more than what is commanded, and wrong something more than what is forbidden: but these are the first conditions of the moral consciousness; and until the mind of the child is sufficiently developed to be conscious of a higher standard, his first notion of duty is that of obedience to his parent: his first notion of transgression is that of disobedience. And when that higher standard comes at last, in what form does it come? Immediately and directly, no doubt, in that of a conscience, of a sense of moral obligation distinct from and superior to mere command. We learn by degrees that there are some things which we ought not to do, even if a parent should command us to do them, because they are forbidden by a voice of higher authority within ourselves. But then arises the further question: Whence does this voice derive its authority? Are my own convictions a law to me simply because they are my convictions, because they are certain parts of my mental constitution, and for no other reason? The sense of inclination, the desire of pleasure and of profit, are facts in my constitution like wise: what gives one of these facts an authority over the rest? What makes the duty to do what is right superior in authority to the desire to do what is pleasant or profitable? The sense of authority, like the sense of dependence, implies a Person in whom it is vested; a law implies a lawgiver. The existence of a principle in my mental constitution entitled to exercise authority over the other parts of the same constitution, can only be explained on the supposition that it is implanted there by a Being to whom I am accountable for my actions, whose nature and relations to me gives Him authority over me, and whose authority is reflected in that principle which He has given to enforce it. To this source of the moral authority of conscience, St. Paul expressly directs us, in the words, "For when the Gentiles, which have not the law, do by nature the things contained in the law, these, having not the law, are a law unto themselves; which shew the work of the law written in their hearts, their conscience also-bearing witness, and their thoughts the meanwhile accusing or else excusing one another." This, then, is another characteristic of our consciousness of the Fatherhood of God, that we acknowledge His authority over us, that in the sense of wrongdoing we are conscious of disobedience to that authority—in other words, that we have a conviction of sin, recognising in our evil acts, not merely the breach of a law within ourselves, but disobedience to the authority of a personal Divine Lawgiver.

Thus much at least is implied in that Fatherhood of God which we may recognise in some degree by the light of natural religion—our natural dependence on Him, our moral obligations towards Him, his providential care over us, his judgment against us when we disobey Him. But this consciousness, culminating as it does in the conviction of sin, is not, God be thanked, all that we know of His Fatherhood. There is another feature of that Fatherhood which He has made known to us by revelation; and to this again we are expressly referred in the language of St. Paul: "I find then a law, that when I would do good, evil is present with me. For I delight in the law of God after the inward man; but I see another law in my members, warring against the law of my mind, and bringing me into captivity to the law of sin which is in my members. O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this death? I thank God [who hath delivered me] through Jesus Christ our Lord. There is therefore now no condemnation to them which are in Christ Jesus, who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit; for the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus hath made me free from the law of sin and death." To the same effect are the words of St. John. "Hereby know we that we dwell in Him, and He in us, because he hath given us His Spirit. And we have seen and do testify that the Father sent the Son to be the Saviour of the world."

"Ye have received the spirit of adoption, whereby we cry, Abba, Father." The language of the New Testament in this and other passages, indicates a new and higher relation, in which we are related to God as children to a parent. It tells us that, though in our natural relations to God as our Creator and moral Governor there is much that resembles and may be fitly represented by the image of a father and a son, yet these natural analogies are but types and shadows of a truer and more real relation, in which we are the children of God by adoption and grace. It tells us also of the mystery of another Fatherhood of God; through which we are admitted to this adoption. It tells us of the Eternal Fatherhood of the Eternal Son, and of the sending forth of that Son in the fulness of the time, to redeem them that were under the law, that we might receive the adoption of sons. In these lower manifestations of God's Fatherhood which natural religion in some degree presents to us, the analogies derived from the human relation are used as a means to indicate and illustrate the corresponding features of the divine relation. In this higher and revealed relation, the divine reacts upon the human; the natural idea of Fatherhood is sanctified and spiritualized by all that is implied in the thought that this Father is God. As from our natural parent we derive a natural life and sustenance, so from our Divine Parent we derive a divine life and sustenance. It is not merely that God is the primary, as our parents are the secondary source of one and the same natural life; it is not merely that God is the primary, as our parents are the secondary source of our moral training by the ideas of duty and disobedience; it is the further gift of a principle of divine life, distinct from and beyond all that pertains to our natural life: redemption through God the Son, begotten of the Father, sanctification through God the Holy Ghost proceeding from the Father and the Son. The exact nature of the relation between the Divine and Infinite Personality and the human and finite personality must indeed remain a mystery to us while this mortal life continues; bound up as it is with the highest of divine mysteries, the Trinity and the Incarnation. As we know not the full significance of that mystery of divine love, God manifest in the flesh, so doubtless we know not the full significance of the associated mystery of our own adoption to be the children of God, "heirs of God, and joint heirs with Christ." That there is much yet unknown, and not to be known in this life, is declared in the words of St. John, which while bidding us to forward in faith to what shall be revealed hereafter, point out at the same time one practical lesson during our state of imperfect knowledge here: "Beloved, now are the sons of God, and it doth not yet appear what we shall be: but we know that when He shall appear, we shall be like Him, for we shall see Him as He is. And every man that hath this hope in Him purifieth himself, even as He is pure."

Lay Delegates—How Elected.

It seems to be a fact pretty well conceded that the plan for the introduction of Lay Delegation into the economy of our Church, has been ratified by the Annual Conference. We shall know, certainly, however, in a few days. The Bishop met in Nashville this month, which time the official vote will be counted, and the result announced. In the mean time by way of preparing for the change, we will make a few suggestions in regard to the mode of electing the lay delegates to our Annual Conference. The plan adopted by the General Conference and submitted for ratification, provides that the delegates to the Annual Conferences shall be elected "by the District Stewards, or in such other manner as the Annual Conference may direct." Our Conference took no action upon the mode of electing these delegates, thinking it best to wait until a measure would receive the requisite vote necessary to make it a law. As no "other manner" was directed by the Conference, we think it plain that the delegates to our next session must be elected in the manner prescribed by the General Conference, to wit: "by the District Stewards." If the Conference will assemble shall prefer a different manner of electing them, of course it can adopt any mode not inconsistent with the principles of the plan. The time of holding District Meetings, we would suggest, would be a good time to them together for that purpose, we presume there will be a District meeting in each District some time during the summer or fall.

The conditions of eligibility to Conferences, as fixed by the General Conference are:

1. "Of the four lay-representatives in the Annual Conference from District one may be a local preacher, i. e., while it is not required that a local preacher be elected, it is nevertheless forbidden to elect more than one local preacher from a District."

2. "The delegates must be years of age, and must have been for six years next preceding his election a member of the Church; i. e., he must have been a member continuously without an interval outside its pale for the last six years."

Care should be taken to see that the delegates elected should be the necessary qualifications, and their election should be properly certified to the Annual Conference by the President and Secretary of the Boards of Stewards elect them. Alternates should also be elected in every case so as to secure a full representation in case delegates fail to attend.

Should it be ascertained that the official vote is counted, that measure is adopted, all should cheerfully acquiesce in it, and laymen should by their hearty response to this effort, the part of the law-making authorities to give a fresh impetus to operations. If so, we could believe that this will prove to be the key note to a grander movement of the Church than has hitherto marked her progress.

THE MORTALITY OF BACHELORS.

Stark of the Scottish Register Office has compared the vital statistics of married and unmarried men, and announces that the mean age of married at death is 60.2 years, while that of the bachelors is 47.7—excluding those who die before 25 in both classes. We do wish to set everybody against poor bachelors, but this point does not demand the attention of life insurance companies.—if bachelors ever imagine their worth enough to anybody to serve insuring. We did not know that to the command "increase and multiply" was tacitly attached the promise "that thy days may be long in the land," etc.; but it seems so far, that if bachelors wish to recover an average of twelve or half years of life, or such part of it as may not be already irretrievably forfeited, they should make haste to be married. Celibacy seems to be one of Nature's caprices.—Scientific American.

Welcome.—It gives us great pleasure, (says the San Francisco Herald,) to announce that Judge Stueck has returned from his long exile in Mexico. He arrived by the last steamer from Mazatlan. He did not see him as he passed by the city to Sonoma, where his family now are. Thousands will join in saying, welcome to Judge Stueck, and in wishing that he resume his residence in California.

When we turn our backs to the sun we always see our own shadow, and walk in them—but when we turn our face to the sun, and toward it, we see no shadow—light.

For the N. O. Christian Advocate. A Reminiscence of my Early Days.

Among the memories of the past, there is one deeply engraven in my heart, upon which I love to dwell. It was a bright and lovely Sabbath morning in early summer. My mother, with her little ones around her, sat in the front porch, awaiting the carriage to convey us to church. Father had walked down to the stable to see why it was detained, and while we waited, mother took up her hymn book and read us some beautiful and appropriate hymns, for it was one of her maxims "never to be idle."

How well I remember her appearance that morning as she sat reading to us, my little sister and I sitting near, and my baby-brother leaning on her lap. Her bonnet and dress were white, which suited her clear, fair complexion, she had no ornament about her, save a rose-bud in her bosom; and her whole appearance was emblematic of peace and purity. Her person, her temper, and her house, were always in unison on the Lord's day. Cleanliness was next to godliness in her esteem, but she never sacrificed the one for the other.

Roses and honey-suckles were blooming around the porch, perfuming the air and shading us from the morning sun, while a mocking bird sat over us, making my little brother laugh at the rapid variations of his mimic notes.

Never while I live can I forget that lovely morning, and the beautiful picture my mother made as she sat, robed in white, with that dark background of clustering vines.

While sitting thus, "improving the time," a servant came to tell her that "aunt Mary wanted to see her before she started to preaching." She arose at once, and bidding the house-maid remain with the two younger children, she took me by the hand, and we went over to the "quarters" to see aunt Mary. She had nursed my mother when a baby, and when mother married, she followed her "baby" as she still called her, to her new home; and was an efficient and faithful friend and servant, until disabled by disease. She had been bed-ridden for many months, and one of my dearest pleasures was to be sent by mother, to carry some delicacy to aunt Mary, and to read the Bible to her, whenever mother was too busy to go herself. The Psalms were her especial delight—How she loved to repeat again and again, as she would lie with her hands clasped, and her eyes raised to heaven—"The Lord is my Shepherd, I shall not want, he maketh me to lie down in green pastures, he leadeth me beside the still waters," etc.

Sometimes my little sister and brother would accompany my mother or myself to see her, carrying something nice to "mamma" in their little hands. She would say, "God bless my little lambs, and God bless their dear father and mother," and pray we all meet in heaven." She would then make them get up on her bed and sit where she could see them, while she listened to mamma or myself, as we would read to her. It was pleasant and profitable to listen to her comments. How her eyes would kindle, and her voice tremble as she would repeat some favorite passage after us—"God is Love," was her favorite theme—"Dat is true, dat is just so, my mistis—He knows every ting and He knows I love my Jesus, and I know He loves me too, I aint noting but a poor old cripple, I cant do noting for my Saviour, but I can love and praise Him, Glory be to God on high."

This morning as we reached her bedside, she held out her hands to us, and said, "Mistis I think I am about to go, and I wanted to see you one time more,—dey say you was starting to church, and I was 'fraid you would not git back time enough to see old Mary. I wanted to tell you how much I love you and master, and de dear little children, and how I thank you for your goodness to me. You never forgot old mammy, night and day, hot or cold, you come to see me—you first make your old nurse talk about religion. When I see 'ba' go up and jine the church,

I say, 'well, is my chile gwine to heaven and leave old mammy behind? no, I cant stand dat,' so I set out to seek de Lord, and you help me to find Him. Now my chile I am going to heaven and leave you—but you wont stay long,—after awhile, when you have done all the will of your Master, He will call you too—Dear mistis pray for me one time more." With the tears streaming from her eyes, my dear mother knelt at her side and prayed for her and for us all.

When we arose, mother said, "mammy do you see your way clear? are you willing to go now if it is the will of God?" "O yes, mistis, I want to go! but the Master's time is the best time, and I will try to be patient till he sends his messenger for de old woman.—Good-bye, mistis, good-bye to master and de dear children, I want you all to meet me in heaven." "I will stay with you, mammy, if you wish me," said my mother. "O no, my mistis! go to preaching, it won't be long before we will meet again, and part no more."

We shook hands with her for the last time, and returned to the house. The carriage was at the door, and as father handed us in, mother gave aunt Mary's last message. He said he would ride around there to bid her "good-bye," and we drove off.

Dear mother wept all the way to the church, and her first words as we entered the house on our return were, "is aunt Mary still alive?" No, she was gone. We went over late in the evening to see if she was prepared for her burial on the morrow. The elder servants were sitting under the trees before her door, singing as we came up. They arose and came around the door, as my parents entered, and stood with heads uncovered near the remains of her who had been to them a faithful servant on earth, but who had now gone to her reward in heaven.

My mother wept as if her heart were broken, as she turned the sheet softly back and gazed on that aged face, now so calm, so peaceful. "Did she suffer much when dying?" she asked one of the women—"O no, mammy, she went to sleep as soon as master left her, and she never waked up any more, we didnt know when she died." "I am thankful for that—come children and look at old mammy for the last time." She gently laid the sheet over the dear old face, and we returned to the house. As we entered it, we again heard that solemn funeral hymn as it floated up from the "quarters" in the still evening air. AMEX.

INTERESTING STATISTICS.

The number of Gospel Ministers laboring to evangelize the population of the United States, is as follows:

	Effet.	Local.	Total.
M. E. Church, North.	6,044	8,452	14,496
M. E. Church, South.	2,311	4,201	6,512
Prot. Meth. Church.	819	750	1,569
African M. E. Church.	513	2,100	2,613
Evangelical Association.	405	323	728
Wesleyan Methodists.	190	164	354
Free Will B. Ch. (Conn.).	217	411	628
Free Meth. dist. Church.	67	69	136
Prim. Meth. Church.	20	34	54
Total for 1865.	10,873	17,281	28,154

The number of ministers belonging to all the Methodist bodies in the United States, in all of their grades, is as follows:

	Regular or effective Preachers	Local Preachers	Superannuated	Supernumerary	Total.
	10,873	17,281	587	234	29,155

As there are superannuated and supernumerary preachers belonging to several of these branches, whose numbers we could not obtain, it is evident that the entire ministerial force of Methodism is not far from 30,000, besides class-leaders and exhorters by thousands, who perform a vast amount of labor.

The number of ministers of other denominations is as follows:

Regular Baptists,	3,509	Tankers	100
Southern Baptists,	4,000	Six Principle Bapt	72
Free Will Bapt's	1,002	Seventh-day Bapt	62
Cambellites,	1,000
Admission Bapt	720	Total,	11,148
Whole churchmen	270

The Presbyterians, Old School and New, in the following table, include regular pastors, licentiates, stated supplies, editors, and teachers:

	Old School.	2,246	Associated.	11
New School.	1,779	Reformed.	113
Confederate.	1,150	Assoc. Reformed.	31
Southern (O. S.)	810
United.	50	Total.	6,200

The "Associated Reformed" include the Associate Reformed Synod

of New York and the Associate Reformed Synod of the South, the latter much the larger. The "Reformed" embraces two wings, sometimes called the Old School and New. The "United" include the United Presbyterians and the United Synod. Some of these small branches are so mixed that the numbers may not be exactly accurate.

The ministers of the remaining denominations are as follows:

	Congregational.	2,719	Reformed Dutch.	120
Episcopalians.	2,689	Unitarians.	237
Evangelical.	2,541	Jews.	240
Lutherans.	2,543	Moravian.	14
United Brethren.	1,677
Universalists.	735	Total.	11,341
German Reformed.	505

In the above table all the orders of the Romish clergy are included; bishops, priests, and deacons of the Episcopalians; and pastors, "acting pastors," "not specified," and "other ministers," of the Congregational body. The total number of ministers of all denominations is as follows:

Methodists, all branches and grades,	24,322
Baptists, all branches,	11,145
Presbyterians, all branches,	6,765
All others,	11,341
Total of ministers,	61,573

THE ANNUAL MEETINGS.

Last week was truly a festival week with us in Nashville. All the Bishops—except Bishop Kavanaugh, who is in California—were present, and we are happy to say, all in good health. Bishop Andrew is feeble, but was able to preach on Sunday, April 14, at the Elm Street Church—the edifice recently transferred to us by our Cumberland Presbyterian Brethren in exchange for Mulberry Street Church. He attended the McKendree Sunday-school (where Dr. Linn made an admirable address), and prayed with the children, and then went to the Elm Street Sunday-school, and addressed the children, before preaching to the large congregation there assembled.

Bishop Early seems to have almost entirely recovered from the injuries he received last year—he moves with an erect form and elastic step, and is as deeply as ever interested in the great important work. Bishop Paine and all the other Bishops look well—except Bishop Marvin, who, we are told, always looks as if his health were more feeble than it really is. The services of all the Bishops—except, of course, Bishop McTear, who is at home in Nashville—were had in requisition on Sunday, and several of them twice during the day. Other distinguished brethren occupied Presbyterian, Baptist, and Methodist pulpits, greatly to the edification of those to whom they ministered. A large number of visiting brethren were in attendance besides the members of the Board of Domestic Missions and the Book Committee. Indeed, it was like an Annual Conference, or rather the epitome of a General Conference. Our citizens entertained the ministers, with great hospitality: the City Hotel and St. Cloud took four each, and the Commercial, Swanee, Central, and Nicholson House, two each, and their guests were greatly gratified with the kind attentions and good cheer which they received. Our friend, Mr. Acton Young, of the City Hotel—we observed, being our near neighbor—displayed his characteristic courtesy and hospitality by keeping open house for all that might find it convenient to sit at his table d'hôte. The Rev. Bishop Doggett, and Messrs. Watson, of Memphis, and Pickard, of St. Louis, were among his guests. The Rev. Dr. Young and the other pastors contributed greatly to the comfort of visiting brethren.

Among the most pleasant items—to us especially—we note the presence of three of our excellent brethren of the press, the Revs. J. W. Cunningham, of St. Louis, W. C. Johnson, of the Memphis, and Dr. Myers, of the Southern Christian Advocate. Their discourses, counsels, and social converse, were highly appreciated. Besides those we have mentioned, the Rev. Drs. W. A. Smith, Finley, Anderson, Bottumley, Hunter, Harwell, Rogers, Taylor, Morton, Seabee, Deavenport, Winfield, J. F. Redford, and others from abroad, besides many ministers of the Tennessee Conference, were present, and in various ways gave interest to the occasion.

The Board of Domestic Missions was in session Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday; the Book Committee, Monday and Tuesday; and the Bishops were in convocation Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday. Very important business was discharged by these several bodies, some of which is detailed in this week's issue.

The missionary meetings at Tulip Street on Tuesday night, and at Elm Street on Wednesday night, were interesting and profitable. It was matter of regret that the meetings, appointed for McKendree on Monday night was prevented by unfavorable weather.

Meeting of the Book Committee.

The Book Committee met at the Publishing House on the 15th inst., to consider the interests of the Publishing House, and adjourned on the next day. There were present, A. L. P. Green, Chairman; J. H. Linn, S. Watson, E. H. Myers, J. B. McFerrin, A. P. McFerrin, W. R. Elliston, and T. Anderson.

A. H. Redford, Book Agent, made a written report of the condition of the Publishing House, and referred to the Committee several questions in which he asked advice or instruction from them.

We give below the results of the deliberations of the Committee on these and other subjects brought before them. The Agent having deemed it expedient and necessary to resume the general book and stationery business, which had been discontinued by the former Agent, and he having asked the opinion of the Book Committee on this subject, the following Resolution was adopted:

Resolved, That we approve the plan adopted by the Agent of the Publishing House in conducting its affairs, especially in placing it upon a general commercial basis.

The following preamble and resolutions were passed:

Whereas, Professor A. B. Stark has brought to the notice of this Committee the Home Monthly, a valuable family magazine, printed for him at the Publishing House; and whereas, although this Committee does not feel authorized to take such official action respecting any periodical as would make the impression that we have adopted it as a publication of the Church, yet feeling it due to the promotion of a healthful religious literature, and on account of the worthy character of this magazine; therefore,

Resolved, That we recommend the "Home Monthly" to the patronage of our Church, until such time as the Book Committee establish a like publication for the Church, as instructed by the General Conference.

After hearing a full verbal statement from the Book Agent, of the present condition of the House, the prosperity and prospects of the Nashville Christian Advocate and the Sunday-school Visitor, the Committee passed the following resolutions:

Resolved, 1. That the Book Committee is highly gratified to hear from the Book Agent, that the business of the Publishing House has been eminently prosperous, considering all the difficulties he has encountered in his work.

Resolved, 2. That we hold the Church deeply indebted to the Book Agent for his industry, energy, and fidelity in conducting the business of the Publishing House; and that we again urge the Church, the preachers, and the Conferences, to the circulation of our literature, and the support of the Publishing House.

The above embraces all the matters important to the public, brought before the Book Committee, which held a very pleasant and satisfactory session.

It is proper to state that A. R. Winfield, a member of the Book Committee, arrived in Nashville about the time of the adjournment of the Committee, having been detained on the route by the late floods.

SUPPORT OF THE BISHOPS.

I wish to call special attention to the following notice, which has already appeared in the Church papers:

At a meeting of sundry members of the Board of Domestic Missions, Book Committee, and others, at the Publishing House, on Thursday, April 18, Dr. W. A. Smith was called to the Chair, and Thos. O. Summers appointed Secretary. The object of the meeting was stated by Dr. Green to be to devise a plan to meet the deficiencies anticipated in paying the salaries of the Bishops for the year ending June 1, 1867. On motion of Dr. McFerrin,

Resolved, That the Book Agent be recommended to make a statement of the present deficiencies of the Bishops, and to specify what Conferences are deficient, and to what extent; and to urge upon the Presiding Elders and pastors in said Conferences the adoption of prompt measures to liquidate the same.

Resolved, That our friends generally throughout the Connection are earnestly requested to forward liberal contributions to the Book Agent, to assist in meeting this emergency.

Resolved, That the Book Agent be requested to distribute the moneys received by him for this interest among the Bishops, according to their respective claims and receipts.

Resolved, That we request the Book Agent to make a pro rata settlement with the Bishops according to the Discipline, as soon as possible after the close of the fiscal year.

The meeting then adjourned.
Thos. O. SUMMERS, Sec'y.

A lady in Kentucky Conference donated $2,000.

The amounts from St. Louis and Missouri Conferences were reported by Bishop Doggett, together, and as no receipts were sent the Book Agent, he could not learn whether either Conference had paid all their portion.

It will be seen from the above showing, that after deducting the $2,000 contributed by a lady in Kentucky, for the Bishops's support, the deficiency is still over $6,000.

The only Conference that paid the full amount of their assessment are the Montgomery, Memphis, and North-west Texas. The Pacific and Columbia Conferences have not been heard from, but it is presumed that they have paid their amounts.

This deficiency falls very heavily on the noble men who are laboring so assiduously to promote the interests of the Church. The Episcopal year begins the first of June of each year; and before the commencement of the year which will soon close, several of them on whom the calamities of the war bore heavily, had no individual resources on which to fall back.

But to a generous Church I need say no more. The preachers will please at once, either publicly or privately, raise such amounts as they can, and forward to me at Nashville.

SCIENTIFIC.

THE EDUCATION OF THE EYE.—Our physical senses are unreliable until developed by use. The infant as readily reaches for the moon as for the rattle lying in his lap, and even apprentices to a mechanical occupation frequently make ludicrous mistakes until they have acquired that skill of vision usually known as the "mechanical eye," so necessary to every finished workman.

It should be the object of boys even in their sports to cultivate this sense of vision as a means to their after success, if any mechanical branch is to be their business in life. For this reason the use of the fowling piece, rifle, and the bow and arrow is to be commended. By either of these the eye becomes accustomed to measuring distances. This quality of calculating distance is first acquired by the observation of the relative position of objects. If a rifle is used and the sight is adjusted to one hundred yards it is well to first measure the distance by a line, as a pocket tape, and gradually to become accustomed to fix the distance by the eye without any mechanical aid. It is surprising how expert even a boy may become in measuring distances by practice. We said the noting of the relative position of objects should at first be used as a means to the end, but as soon as possible the eye should emancipate itself from this dependence. After becoming familiar with distances on land the learner will find great difficulty in estimating distances on the water, especially on a smooth expanse, having no fixed objects above its surface. He will generally understate the distance. So in measuring across depressions, as a valley or even a narrow gully, every boy knows the liability and danger of such miscalculations. It may appear easy to leap from one bank to the other of a brook, but often his confidence in the uneducated eye may be punished by a good, thorough wetting.

The laws of optics should be made a study by the young. We well remember the many trials to which we were subjected when a boy, in consequence of our ignorance of the refraction of light in passing from a medium like the air into a denser one, as water. The pickerel loves to sun himself lying in shallow water, just beneath the surface, where he remains perfectly motionless unless disturbed. The shooting of these fish, either with bow and arrow or with the fowling piece, is a common amusement, but he who would succeed must understand, in practice if not in theory, the refraction of rays of light. The fish is not where he appears to be when seen at an angle, as when the spectator is on the bank. If aimed at the spot will not touch him. This quality of light can be illustrated by thrusting a straight stick into still water, as in a pail or tub of water. At the point where the surface of the water touches the stick it will appear as if broken or bent at an angle.

Measurements on a much smaller scale are also useful as educators of the eye. After an examination of the foot rule with its divisions it is well to mentally calculate surfaces, as the length, width, and height of a table, the dimension of a block of wood, etc., and then to verify the calculation by the application of the rule, which may be at all times carried in the pocket.

These experiments may seem puerile, but the mechanic knows the value of them, and it is as well that the boy—the future apprentice and workman—should thus prepare himself for his course and make his way, as a learner, easier. No means to an end should be despised because of its apparent simplicity, and whether a man is a practical mechanic or not he will often see the value of a correct eye in estimating and measuring.—Sci. Am.

Tempering Steel.

Messrs. Editors:—The tempering of steel tools seems to be a subject of discussion between correspondents V., and W. L. Dolbier, in numbers 7 and 12 current volume. Both appear to rely upon the color the surface of the steel assumes while drawing the temper after hardening; in order to determine the proper degree of hardness to the tool that it may best perform its part in the work designed. I believe both to be in error. By experience I have found that we can neither depend upon the degree of polish nor color of surface. The secret lies in the working of the steel, and in the proper degree of heat given the steel to be hardened. You cannot tell that a piece of steel is hard or soft by polishing its surface and then exposing it to the heat and watching the different colors, for the same colors will appear on steel that has never been hardened as on a hardened piece when exposed to the same degree of heat. There are so many tools made from steel each having its own peculiar duty to perform, requiring a special temper, that in my opinion there can be no fixed rule laid down to govern the art of tempering steel tools. To become an expert in the business requires judgment, close attention and long experience. It is a fact that there are more butchers of steel, disguised as blacksmiths, who are sure to destroy the life of a piece of steel the first time they place it in the fire than there are of those who understand steel or even know anything about its nature. If a tool does not stand after going through their butchering process the fault is laid to the steel, the quality is bad, etc. For hardening I believe that steel should never be heated above a cherry red, and dark at that, and then in drawing the temper one must be governed by experience. W. L. D., should not mind as to what degree of polish he gives his steel providing he still persists in risking the merits of the tools he tempers by the color; all that is necessary is to remove the outside or scale so that you have a white surface. E. M. F.

Springfield, Ohio.

[Our correspondent is undoubtedly correct in his belief that judgment, close attention, and long experience is necessary to give assurance of success in working and tempering steel. It is an art not to be learned from verbal instructions alone. But his experience differs from ours if no dependence can be placed upon the color of steel in tempering. If he who tempers the tool knows the use to which it is to be applied, and the amount and kind of forging to which it has been subjected, the color on the steel, after hardening and while drawing the temper, is, we think, a valuable guide. ARGENTIFEROUS LEAD ORE is deprived of its silver by M. Cordure, by adding a small quantity of zinc to the fused ore. The zinc forms an alloy with the silver, lighter than the lead, and thus brings it to the surface, where it cools and may be removed, remelted and separated.—Sci. Am.

ARSENICAL SOAP.—This preparation is used to preserve the skins of birds and other small animals. Take of carbonate of potash 12 oz.; white arsenic, white soap, and slacked lime, of each 4 oz.; powdered camphor, 1 oz. Add sufficient water to form a paste.

The proportions of platinum that appear to improve steel for edge instruments are from 1 to 3 per cent.; 1.5 per cent. will probably be very nearly right.

SKILLED LABOR.—In the window-glass factories of Pittsburgh the "blowers" and "flatters" receive as high as $250 per month.

TO AGENTS.

Our agents will please, whenever practicable, forward money by draft on Mobile, or New Orleans, payable to our order. We have reason to believe that of all the monies forwarded to us by mail but a very small amount has failed to reach us: whenever the letters have been registered.

TO SUBSCRIBERS.

Any person wishing to subscribe for this paper can do so, by paying the Methodist preacher in the circuit, and forwarding to us his receipt for three dollars, with the address of the subscriber upon it, stating Post office, State, Circuit, and Conference. The receipt ought to be taken in duplicate.

TO ADVERTISERS.

This paper has for many years been well known in this community as the very best advertising medium by which the business men of the city could bring their merchandize, trades, professions, and the like, before country readers. This is easily understood when it is remembered that the four hundred preachers who are scattered throughout these States in the Rio Grand, East Texas, Louisiana, Mississippi, Montgomery and Alabama Methodist Conferences, are all, more or less active agents for the paper; and when it is also remembered that our paper circulates among a large class of people who seldom see any other New Orleans paper.

NEW ORLEANS DISTRICT MEETING.—To be held 4th Sabbath and Sabbath in April—Carondelet street church—opening at 10 o'clock A. M.

1. It is desirable that all the official members of the several Quarterly Conferences in the District be present, including Traveling and Local Preachers.

2. That written reports be ready upon—The financial state of the charge—The amount due on parsonages, churches, etc.—Trustees Report.—The state of Sabbath Schools.—The state and number of membership.—The amounts raised, and the plans at work for Missions, Domestic, Home, and Foreign.

3. That varied interests necessary to strengthen Methodism be considered such as: the best methods for Church Extension: for securing the active co-operation of the membership for supplying the destitute with the gospel: and for the support of the ministry: and for the advancement of Education.

COLOR-MANIA.

Either the New England Conference is demented upon the subject of the warm-skinned sons of Ham, or the rest of mankind is. This body of Divines is out in an "Appeal" to their "Dear brethren and Sisters"—white—exhorting them to be entreated, and receive colored pastors:—"as a duty, which, in our most solemn judgment, we believe God calls upon his churches in this hour and land to boldly perform: as a duty in the discharge of which he specially requires this Conference to lead the way." The case which gives rise to this "appeal" is stated.

"Three years ago we admitted to our membership a well known and able minister of our church, whose services in the local ranks had made him popular and beloved in many of our churches. But solely on account of his complexion, he could not be received by the charge to which he was sent which even complained that its character had been damaged by having his name, only, thus officially connected with its own. No complaint was made of his abilities, which were unquestioned, and which, under other circumstances, they would have been proud and glad to have enjoyed as their own. They revolted from him solely because of the color of his skin."

"We entreat you," says the Conference, "to open your hearts and consent to the opening your pulpits to their official ministrations." The reasons given are, First, "The Spirit of the age demands it of us." Second, "Because of its relations to our political duties." Third, "This is especially needed in view of our consistency." Lastly, "The Spirit of God demands it." When people talk of the "Spirit of the age," "political duties," "consistency," and the "Spirit of God" all in the same breath, it is not difficult to perceive that they have fully as much earth as heaven in their mold. These fierce prophets of Plymouth have been hounding the negro for fifty years, and have been filling church and State with discord and blood to enforce and realize their own speculative notions of a free and equal black man; and now at the end of all this bitter philanthropy, they have not yet educated their own people at home to consent to accept one, no not one negro as a pastor! They are still imploring—"Will you assure our Presiding Elders that you are willing to accept brethren of this hue as your pastors?" The flexible politicians have yielded. See! how heartily they embrace him as a "brother beloved" and exclaim, "Is he not one of us? Are we not all the same blood?" does not the Apostle say that the honest black man is the noblest work of God, or something like that? Bishop Ames has yielded, Bishop Scott has yielded, the new England Conference has yielded, the three Daniels have yielded, but the "Dear Brethren and Sisters" have not yielded. O, ye Puritans by the way of Holland, ye are not straitened in us, but ye are straitened in your own bowels! We have swept the distinction from our Conferences, now we implore you "to disregard all distinctions in schools and churches based on color." "Shall the Church wear these chains after the State has dropped them from her limbs?"

So long as the theory of negro equality is kept in the distance, and there is money in it, and political power in it, you instinctively sharp New England man will accept and adopt it. When there is a mere sprinkling of negro children in a school-room, and one or two light colored people in a church, one can stand it for conscience-sake. But when you talk of putting a regular negro into the office of Preacher in Charge, just because he is educated, and giving him open access to the family circle as a pastor to exhort, counsel, and converse generally with the "dear brethren," not to say anything about the "dear sisters," why, it occurs to us, unless there is some organic change in the divinely implanted attractions and repulsions of our nature, it will take another generation to make the people listen to these prophets who solemnly, with horns of iron, urge such horrible and unnatural "appeals." Man must, forsooth, delude his form, darken his complexion, and sin "against his own body," because "God hath made of one blood all nations of men!" We hope that the "Dear Brethren and Sisters" will reply that "all things are lawful, but all things are not expedient." That a man is not expected to introduce to his family or his bed-chamber, a converted Digger Indian, or Fyche African, because "all men are born free and equal."

"Put yourself in the place of these brethren," says the Appeal. "How would you feel," etc. A white man in any body's place is still a white man; and a negro in any body's place is still a negro, and feels like one. This is one of the fallacies of fanatical world-benders. One cannot put himself in a negro's place without first becoming a negro, and ceasing to be himself. Then he will have only a negro's history, a negro's ancestry, his unchangeable skin, his proper sense of having been made by the hand of God inferior in form and countenance, though equally capable of happiness, of righteousness, and of peace with the white man. He can no more complain of the broad distinction, and the line of separation which his white brethren insist on maintaining in their intercourse with him, than he can of the stamp which the Almighty has placed upon his brow. He will strive like all the rest of the human race for a better condition: but his present position can neither deprive him of hope, or heaven, because it does deprive him of a white wife. Dissatisfaction with God and man at one's estate in life is an endless misery; and such appeals as this of the New England preachers, are well calculated to disturb the African, the church, and the Universe. We hope that the "Dear Brethren and Sisters" will always have sense enough to revolt from a black pastor, "solely because of the color of his skin."

The N. O. Dist. Sunday School-Union.

The 20th Anniversary of this Society was celebrated in Carondelet Street Church, on last Sabbath afternoon. The body of the house was filled with scholars, and looked brilliant as the "southern spring-time." The American schools have become sufficiently large to fill it of themselves. Our German Sunday Schools now have their celebrations separately. The galleries of the house were crowded with parents and friends. It was a most delightful and successful exhibition of the kind. The singing was admirable, and the speaking better than any we have ever heard on a like occasion—growing better and better to the very last. Wm. H. Foster, Esq., the President of the Society, and the several Superintendents of the Schools, and all the Teachers deserve great credit for the care and pains which had evidently been taken in preparing the children for it. As usual, the girls did the greater part of the singing. American boys have the art of being particularly man whenever it is especially desirable that they should make themselves heard. At all other times we are apt to hear from them. They made up for this, however, by committing their pieces perfectly, and delivering them with propriety and grace. So long as our Churches here can present before the Lord so many precious jewels, as she did on this Sabbath afternoon, her glory will not depart from her. We feel sure that the audience derived much pleasure, and a new impulse toward heaven, by what they heard and saw.

N. O. DISTRICT MEETING.

We give a good deal of space this week to its record. The attendance was good, better than was expected. The business men of the Church are usually very busy in their several avocations. We have but few persons in this new country, who, venerable with age, have retired from the common pursuits of life, and are ready to "dwell in the house of the Lord." In the older States, and especially in England, one may see many such, who gently approach Heaven by constant service in the various offices of the Church. They are Stewards, or Leaders, or sit in the Choir, or teach in the Sabbath School, or exhort, or visit the poor and the sick with stated regularity, and their gray hairs moving in and about the house of God make the place glorious. That minute, methodical, and punctual attention to holy things is requisite to the highest development of christian grace and usefulness.

Among the interests discussed by this meeting, there was less importance attached to Church extension than we thought due to it. The Committee reported in the main that at present our paramount thought and care should be to get out of debt. After that, they recommend the planting of Sabbath Schools as an advance, and their development into small Churches, then into large Churches. There were two other systems for extending, which we should like to have heard discussed at some length. That of every man building his own pew—the pew system; and that of gradual collection and gradual expenditure: first, securing a lot, after that putting in the foundation, then running up the walls &c., moving no faster than the money will allow, and making collections before each successive step.

The resolution of the meeting authorizing the German Churches to establish day-schools of their own under the general superintendence of the Quarterly Conference, was an important step in the right direction; it solved a problem which some of the members of the Louisiana Conference have been working at for several years.

Until the meeting of the Annual Conference, as it had contingently determined no way for electing Lay Delegates to its body, it was believed that the law of the General Conference, as now officially announced, devolved their election upon the District Stewards. They accordingly request each Quarterly Conference, at its next meeting, to nominate by ballot one Lay delegate; and from these nominees, they will, at a subsequent meeting of the District Stewards, elect by ballot four Lay Delegates to the Annual Conference.

This, it occurs to us, is a most excellent way to secure an able, experienced, and impartial body of Lay Delegates. As the nomination by ballot would take place usually at the first Quarterly meeting, men would be selected for fitness rather than simply because they will take time to go to Conference. It affords a fair representation from all parts of the work. It prevents any undue advantage from the larger attendance of official membership in the immediate neighborhood of the District meeting. It does not suspend the election and choice of men upon the mere accidents of the hour.

That old gordian knot—how to support the Preacher—was left untied; merely handled. The individual-assessment plan was declared to be the nearest approach to its solution yet discovered.

Though a large city probably feels the influence of a District meeting proportionably much less than a town or a country appointment would, yet it is anywhere a good official training-ground, and enables each member to realize justly the relative importance of his own position, and to get a clearer view of the whole field.

For the N. O. Christian Advocate.
NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Mr. Editor: Bishop Green of Mississippi, asked on the train the other morning, if the object of my visit to Luka was on account of my health: For the spiritual health of the people of this place, the urgent request of Bro. Bancroft brought me here, to assist the faithful young pastor in a protracted meeting continued, without previous announcement, from the prayer meeting of last week. On Monday night the invitation was first extended for penitents to approach the altar for prayer. Four came at once. Already in three or four days 12 to 15 have made a hopeful profession of faith, 25 were praying for pardon on last night. Among the happy converts are Col. P., and Dr. D., prominent influential citizens of the town. The former lost his wife in your city last week, whither they had gone a few weeks ago in hopes of her recovery from consumption. The male and female schools are sharing the benefits of the revival. Professors Spillman and Noreom dismiss their scholars daily, to attend the morning prayer-meetings—and a number of the youths under their care are penitents or happy converts. The former is a son of Rev. W. Spillman, of the Mobile Conference, and of course a member of our church, the latter not a church member, but an exemplary moral man, and opens the school with prayer. We are pleased to see such deserving young men, favored with a very flourishing school. Professor Stamps brings the young ladies of the female school out, for the benefit of the evening services. Last evening the writer enjoyed the privilege of a visit to the Institute, for the purpose of closing the exercises of the school with a lecture and prayer. This evening, Professor Spillman requests a visit to the Collegiate Institute. Parents wishing to educate their sons and daughters in a moral, intelligent, and healthy town, might be well suited at this place. The variety of fine mineral springs, and the favorable locality are attracting a number of people to the place.

The population has increased two fold in the past two years, now numbering one thousand inhabitants. Already two hundred have engaged board, at the hotel for the benefit of the celebrated waters, and every family that will entertain visitors to the springs, will be thronged during the summer. There are two fine schools, two churches, and but one drinking saloon in the town. The religious interest manifested seems to be genuine, thorough and profound—the result of the gospel preached with fidelity—and attended with serious, sober reflection. The Sabbath school is prosperous—Methodism has the ascendancy here decidedly. I am most favorably impressed with the place and people, and am happy to witness such a gracious visitation of the Spirit in convicting and converting power.

At this time a number of laborers are engaged in disintering the federal dead, buried here during the war, to be re-interred at Corinth, twenty miles distant.

Yesterday I went with Bro. Bancroft to the place where many soldiers had been buried. Those engaged in removing the remains of the soldiers are chiefly colored, superintended by a faithful son of Erin. The blackened bones are the principle remains that are found of most of the disinterred, but I was surprised to see several taken up partially petrified. I examined carefully the petrified portions of flesh, and found the muscles, and in one instance, the viscera harder and heavier than the bones. The body of a negro woman was taken up almost entirely petrified, only one foot dropping off, the skin and flesh having their natural appearance, save a reddish color, and the corpse was hard and almost as heavy as a rock.

Nearly all the remains are found in the water, though buried on high land ridges. Those buried in their blankets are as well or better preserved than those interred in biers and coffins. Those who died of disease at the hospitals are said to be oftener petrified than those killed in battle. Their wasted condition and the medicine taken, may have had some influence in the preservation and petrification. The soil in which they were buried does have had its influence. In examining one box of bones I found dollars in silver change, which had been found with the remains. The faithful Irishman places everything found about them with their bones to be reburied together. After doing the work here, I feel that I rather the scattered dead of the sons of the South, should rest in peace than have their bones disturbed by the rough hands of the who labor with many coarse jealous the disgusting work of removing their remains.

Last Sabbath I organized a Sabbath school at Cherokee, Ala., the colored people, which I doubt will result in good to their souls. Last year I was annoyed a great deal by missionaries from Ohio, turning our colored charges; this year where the missionaries have had no preaching scarcely five years until recently, I find missionaries have never been preach at all. And why? We have no churches to be occupied or turbed. If it was a missionary extension movement, would they rather to those without the gospel both among the white and the colored population? I have preached often to the colored as to the white people, since conference, though was entirely voluntary, without connection of the colored people with my charge. I purpose forming another Sabbath school next Sabbath for them, and will attend of those schools every Sabbath, rather than their self constituted preaching, teaching, baptizing, marrying without hope of fee or reward, never accepting one cent of my services. I look for my reward where there is no extension for nor moth to corrode or corrupt. The prophet is not without honor in his own country," but here one speaks in the highest praise the great benefit realized by the of the afflicted, from the use of M. A. Simmon's Vegetable Medicine and Purifying Pills, manufactured by the Dr. in India. The most eminent citizens here bear personal expression, testify of real excellence of the medicine. A considerable amount of sympathy for the destitute are being rendered here and elsewhere. This time many are in great want.

S. M. CHASE, Inka, Miss., April 19, 1867.
P. S. Since the above was written there have been a number of professions, and an increase of number of penitents. The town seems to be interested.

CHINESE MISSION.

Shanghai, Feb. 14, 1867.
REV. H. H. MONTGOMERY: I have just received your letter found us all with severe cold, but nothing serious. My health greatly improved within the last month, but I am not free from the ease which I have had for months, and I fear I shall not be from it while I stay in the East. I have been acting as interpreter at the Prussian consulate in Shanghai for the past eight months, and have been appointed interpreter of the English Municipal Council for three months, and it may be for next year. If I should continue there through the year, then I do not require any support from church at home for one year. It will be different now from what was when I was at the Prussian consulate. I shall not have so much time at my disposal, for my services will be required from morning till night. Heretofore I have been able to preach and work among Chinese during the week. Now I shall have no time except on Sabbath. This is not as I would have it, if it could be ordered otherwise. We have no money in Mission Treasury, and if we had

The Basis of Deliberation.

LONDON April 29.—The conference is to be composed of representatives of Great Britain, France, Prussia, Austria, Russia and Holland. The following basis of deliberations is agreed upon:

France not to enlarge her present boundaries. Luxembourg to be dismantled and its status to be determined. The decision of the conference to be guaranteed by all the powers participating.

LONDON, May 2.—The Peace Conference meets here on the 12th of May. It is understood that Lord Stanley will preside over its deliberations.

King George of Greece arrived at London.

FRANKFORT, April 28.—United States bonds are steadily advancing—were last quoted to-day at 75.

PARIS, April 28.—American bonds sold to-day at 80.

WASHINGTON, May 1.—The Criminal court adjourned until 27th inst., when it was understood that the case of the Jefferson Davis will be tried. The counsel for prosecution having so agreed.

Jefferson Davis has determined to reconsider his declaration that he could not apply for pardon. If not arraigned at the May term of court at Richmond, he will file a petition for pardon. So say his friends here.

Attorney General Stanberry's opinion on the registration clause of the military bill is very liberal, and will enable nearly all those prohibited from voting by Sheridan, to become voters.

Registration—How in goes.

VOTERS, WHITE AND BLACK.—Through the courtesy of Gen. Sheridan we are enabled to make public the following interesting information regarding the registration of voters in this city. It will be seen that colored voters are, so far, in a majority of more than four to one—a fact doubtless resulting from the discouraging conduct pursued by the Registers toward white persons:

HEADQUARTERS FIFTH MILITARY DISTRICT, Acting Assistant Inspector General's Office, New Orleans, La., May 1, 1867.

Tabular Statement of the Number of Voters Registered in the parish of Orleans up to 6 o'clock P. M., April 30:

	WHITE.	COL.	WHOLE.
First District.....	508	2,000	3,100
Second District.....	390	2,135	2,525
Third District.....	298	1,800	2,158
Fourth District.....	723	875	1,600
Fifth District.....	99	915	1,015
Totals.....	2,012	8,957	10,969

Respectfully forwarded for the information of the Major General Commanding.

JAMES W. FORSYTH, Brevet Brig. Gen. and A. A. I. G.

FROM WASHINGTON.

CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN GENERAL SHERIDAN AND GENERAL GRANT.—The following telegraphic correspondence between Gen. Sheridan and Gen. Grant, with regard to who are to be considered as disfranchised, has been placed at our disposal by Maj. Gen. Hartstuf for publication:

[Telegram of April 1st.]
Gen. U. S. Grant, etc.

In consequence of diversity of opinion, I have the honor to request an authoritative decision showing who are prohibited from voting under the military bills, covering all cases.

P. H. SHERIDAN, Maj. Gen. U. S. A. [Telegram of April 6th.]
Gen. U. S. Grant, etc.

I am now in readiness to commence the registration in this city. Will, in a few days, commence throughout the whole State of Louisiana. A reply to my telegram, asking authoritative decision on what classes are disfranchised, is very important.

P. H. SHERIDAN, Maj. Gen. U. S. A. [Reply.]
WAR DEPARTMENT, ACTING GENERAL'S OFFICE, Washington, April 28, 1867.
Gen. U. S. Grant, commanding armies of the U. S.

General.—The secretary of war acknowledges the receipt of a telegram from Major General Sheridan, dated April 1st, in relation to prohibition from voting, and directs me to inform you that it was submitted to the President in cabinet, and instructions deferred until the attorney general completes his opinion upon the same point heretofore presented by Maj. Gen. Schofield, and on reference by the President, now under consideration by the attorney general.

I have the honor to be, general, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
ED. TOWNSEND, A. A. G.

[Telegram to C. C. C.]

WASHINGTON, D. C., Apr. 8, 1867.
Maj. Gen. Sheridan, New Orleans:

Your question as to who are ineligible for registration was submitted to the attorney general. No answer has been received. Go on, giving your own interpretation to the law, until answer is received.

OBITUARIES.

MARY A. HIGGENBOTHAM, wife of W. D. HIGGENBOTHAM, was born near Clinton, La., Dec. 1833, was married to W. D. HIGGENBOTHAM Jan., 1853, and died in Morehouse Parish, La., April 12, 1867.

She was converted during the season of the Louisiana Conference at Waterproof, under a sermon preached by Bishop Cavanaugh, joined the Church on the following day, and remained firm and unwavering in the faith to the close of her life.

Her loss is a sad one. She endeared herself to the Church by her deep, earnest piety, to the entire community by her gentle, unobtrusive manner, her meek, amiable, quiet spirit. In all the relations of life she was a model of excellence. She has left four little children, who will miss forever the most affectionate of mothers, and a husband to lament the loss of a devoted and lovely wife.

May the lesson of her stainless life not be lost in its influence upon the hearts and lives of the loved ones she has left to mourn her loss.

H. T. LEWIS.

MATIE NEAL, daughter of Rev. P. and M. E. Howard, was born April 17th, 1864, and at 10 o'clock on a bright and peaceful Sabbath morning, (February 10th, 1867,) her pure spirit took its everlasting flight to the bright fields of eternal bliss.

With an unusually sweet and attractive disposition, and a mind far too mature for one of her years, she appeared from the first to pure to mingle in the strife and commotion of this earth. And when the messenger came to call her to Jesus, all felt as if they might have expected it, for "earth's fires; flowers are ever soonest snatched away."

Whilst we are loth to part with the sweet Mattie, and aching hearts refuse to be comforted, there is for us a sweet consolation in thinking of this present happy state, and we mourn not as those without hope, for though thou canst come to us no more, we can so live as to meet thee in that better world where sorrow never comes, and parting is no more.

May her early death warn us all of the solemn command, "be ye also ready for ye know not the hour wherein the Son of Man cometh."

Greenwood, Miss., Feb. 1867.

LITTLE FEET, AND LITTLE FOOT-PRINTS.

BY JULIA WESTWOOD.

Many nectared lips have sung,
Both cheerily and sweet,
Of the charming little pit-a-pat,
Of creaking little feet.

On upon the vine-clad porch,
And through the amaranth hall,
Oh! the treasured joys they bring,
With every silvery fall.

On upon the road-side too,
And close down by the spring,
See the little saucy print,
A fairy-fashioned thing.

Down within the meadow green,
And near the rippling rill,
Where the daisy lambskins lie,
Where "tie-tac" goes the mill.

On upon the hill-side moss,
And down within the vale,
Where the blue-eyed daisies grow,
Refreshed by every gale.

Out where gentle, lowing kine,
Come night after the lea,
Oh! the blessed little print,
So beauteous to see.

Telling tales of bluest eyes,
And blackest eyes, and brown,
All brimming full of sunshine bright,
With ne'er an anxious frown.

Telling tales of chubby hands,
The fairest to behold,
Telling too of silken locks,
Both raven-black, and gold.

Telling tales of rounded limbs,
Ay, scarcely ever still,
Telling of the dainty feet,
Wandering up Life's hill.

Telling tales of little hearts,
All filled up to the brim,
With rainbow-dims and starlight,
That no wane can dim.

Telling tales of merry lips,
Where humming bird and bee,
Come to gather honey sweet,
Oh, beautiful to see.

Is this little prototype,
Just find it where you will,
Of little head, and heart and hand,
Meandering Life's hill.

And oh! as thus they travel on,
Through trailing dust and heat,
May God's celestial guardians,
Walk nigh the little feet;

And lead them to that Father-land,
That blissful best abode,
Whose golden streets, and pearly gates,
Conduct them close to God.
Havana, Ala., March, 1867.

LITTLE BOB.

When I was a little girl, I had a young playmate by the name of Mattie Rowell. One day, her father went out to take a walk, and seeing something fluttering in a bush, he went to it, and found it was a robin with a wounded leg. Mr. Rowell succeeded in catching the bird, and carried it home.

Now Mattie had no brothers and sisters to play with, and when her father told her he had brought her a pet, she was delighted; but when she saw how badly the bird was hurt, and how much it suffered, she could not keep back her tears.

The robin had been shot, and if its leg was not really broken, it was badly injured. Mattie wondered that any one could be so cruel as to cause so much suffering to one of God's beautiful creatures.

Mattie's father was a dentist, and she had often watched him make the beautiful, new teeth; so she thought, as her father could do such wonderful things, perhaps he might make a leg for the robin; and she told her father what she had been thinking, but he told Mattie they would bind up its leg, and he thought it would soon be better—which proved true, for Bob, as they called him, although always lame, soon got well, and was a very handsome bird. He would perch on Mattie's head and shoulders, while she was eating her breakfast, and once in a while would hop down and take something from her plate.

Mr. Rowell made a beautiful, white house for Bob, with a large door, blinds (painted green), and a verandah in front. Bob took possession with a great deal of pride, and dedicated it with his first song.

When the window was opened near where the house hung, Bob would fly out and go to the brook, which served him both as bath and mirror, after which he would seat himself in a tall tree and sun himself. Mattie could very often watch him from an up-stair window. Then he grew so independent that he would rather go and find certain bugs and worms for his dinner, with a cherry or two for dessert, than to eat the nice food Mattie prepared for him. And during the hot afternoons, he would rest himself on his verandah, till Mattie came from school, then he would chirp and hop about; and one favorite amusement of his, was to fly to the lookingglass, hang to the frame with his little toes, and look at himself.

Autumn came, and one bright morning, a flock of robins came to a tree near by, and I presume Bob had his arrangements all made, for he joined them and off they flew. Mattie mourned the loss of her pet for many days. His house still hung by the window.

The long winter had gone, and Mattie had been in search of wild flowers, one spring day, and as she was arranging them, with some moss, to make a flora's dish, to surprise her mother, something flew against the window. She was startled, but she caught sight of a bird on the window sill. The window was opened, and Bob, her own dear Bob, came limping in.

Mattie was so rejoiced, and her father and mother seemed almost as much pleased as their little daughter.

He flew directly to his old home, the little white house, and after seeming satisfied that all was right, flew off, but soon returned, bringing his bride. Mrs. Robin was not so well acquainted, but after a great deal of petting and persuasion, Bob and his little wife went to house-keeping. Bob made a very attentive husband and father, for you must know that in a few weeks, they had quite a family in the little white house. When Mattie looked in at the front door, she could see five little open mouths; and Bob and his wife seemed to think, as other parents do, that theirs were remarkable children.

O what a delightful time we children had, watching Mattie's pets! Bob and his mate reared two broods that summer, and in the fall they traveled south, to spend the winter; and as Mattie's parents moved from there during the winter, she never knew if Bob returned.

Mattie is a woman, now, and, I presume, often tells her "birdies" in the "home nest" of the happy days she had with her pet robins.

Little Corporal.

From the Little Corporal.

The Pear Tree.

TRANSLATED FROM THE GERMAN.

Old Rupert sat, at the close of day, in the shade of a beautiful pear tree, which stood before his house, while his grandson ate of the pears, and could not cease praising the sweet fruit.

Then said the grandfather, "I must tell you how this tree came here. One evening, more than fifty years ago, I stood here, when there was empty space, but where now this pear tree stands, and complained to a rich neighbor of my poverty. 'O,' said I, 'how perfectly contented should I be, if I could only possess one hundred dollars.'"

"The neighbor, who was a wise man, said: 'That you can easily do, if you only set about it. See,' said he, 'there in the soil, where you stand, are more than a hundred dollars, if you can only get them.'"

"At that time, I was only a foolish young man, and so in the following night I dug in the ground on that spot, and to my great mortification found not a single dollar. In the morning, the neighbor saw where I had been digging, and laughed heartily at my simplicity.

"I see," said he, 'that you did not understand me. I will send you a young pear tree; set that in the hole which you have dug, and after a year the dollars will begin to appear.'"

"I set out the young tree. It grew, and became what you now see it. The luscious fruit which it has borne year after year, has brought me in far more than a hundred dollars, and it is yet a capital which yearly brings in a good interest."

"Open your eyes,
And open your mind,
Work with your hands,
And wishes you'll find."

HOUSEKEEPERS' DEPARTMENT.

ANOTHER CORN-BREAD RECIPE.—One pint of Indian meal, half pint of wheat flour, two eggs, well beaten, a pinch of salt, one pint of milk and one half teaspoonful of soda, dissolved in warm water; one teaspoonful of cream tartar, which sift and mix well with the meal and flour. Mix all the ingredients together. Butter your pan well, and bake immediately in a quick oven.

TO DRIVE OFF RATS.—Take a bunch of matches and soak them overnight in a teaspoonful of water; then take out the matches, thicken the water with Indian meal to a stiff dough, adding a spoonful of sugar and a little lard; lay it about the premises where the rats and nothing else will get it.

CONFECTIONER'S JELLY.—Isinglass dissolved in water by boiling, and evaporated until it jellies on cooling. In order to render it perfectly transparent it should be clarified with white of egg. Spices, wine and milk may be added to suit the taste. Three ounces of good isinglass should make at least a quart of very strong jelly.

RICE CAKE.—1. Half a pound of ground rice, half a pound of loaf sugar and four eggs. Beat the eggs separately, and then the whole ingredients together for half an hour, and bake in a mold. 2. Half a pound of ground rice, sifted through a fine muslin; six ounces of loaf sugar finely pounded, four eggs, the grated rind of one lemon; put these ingredients into a large basin, and well whip it for twenty minutes; then put it in a mold, and bake in a quick oven. 3. Half a pound of ground rice, half a pound of the finest flour and half a pound of loaf sugar (pounded), seven eggs, a quarter of a pound of butter and the rind of a lemon, grated. Beat the eggs well first, then mix in the other ingredients, and beat them together for three-quarters of an hour. Put into a buttered mold, and bake for three-quarters of an hour in a quick oven.

TO BOIL VEGETABLES GREEN.—Put them into plenty of boiling water which has been salted; keep them uncovered and boiling fast till they are done. To counteract the hardness of the water, should it exist, a little carbonate of soda may be added with the salt.

CORNING FLAX.—Melt a piece of white beeswax, about the size of a filbert kernel, in one ounce of olive oil; to this add one or two drops of otto of roses or some other strong perfume.

MILK OF ROSES.—Put into a small bottle two ounces of rose water, one teaspoonful of oil of sweet almonds, ten drops of oil of tartar. Shake the bottle until the whole are combined. A beautiful cosmetic, to be applied with a corner of a towel or a cambric handkerchief, after the morning ablutions.

OIL TO PROMOTE THE GROWTH OF THE HAIR.—Castor oil, half a pint; alkali root, half an ounce; oil of bergamot, ten minims; oil of cloves, ten minims; civet, one and a half grains. The castor oil must be gently heated; when sufficiently hot, it should be poured upon the alkali root, which immediately communicates its color. It must then be strained, and when cold, the other ingredients are to be stirred into it. This oil will not only promote the growth of the beard and whiskers, but will also strengthen and improve the hair in every respect.

TO TAKE OUT GREASE AND INK STAINS.—Spirits of ammonia will take out spots of grease, ink, fruit stains, etc., on cloth, silk, muslin, or any other material, without injury to the color of the fabric. It can be purchased in small quantities at any chemist's.

UNFLAMMABLE DRESSES.—It is much to be regretted that the process of rendering the materials of ladies' dresses unflamable is not more generally understood and used by the public. Either of three substances: phosphate of ammonia, tungstate of soda, and sulphate of ammonia—can be mixed in the starch, and at cost of one penny a dress, deaths from fire can be rendered, in point of fact, impossible. Articles of apparel subjected to those agents can, if they burst at all, only smoulder, and in no case can they blaze up in the sudden and terrible manner in which so many fatal accidents have occurred to the fair wearers of crinoline.

FARM AND GARDEN.

Carrots for stock.

While some of our people are troubling themselves greatly in regard to the cultivation of corn and oats, for the limited number of horses and cows kept by them generally, I would like to direct their attention very briefly to a much more economical kind of food for stock. I allude to carrots. It is, perhaps, not as generally known as it should be that carrots may be given with perfect safety, and with the very best results, to every species of stock; more especially during the Winter, and in early Spring. When given to cows, they not only increase the quantity of the milk, but give firmness, color and flavor to the butter. To horses they may be given raw, though for horses or cows they are more nutritious and better relished when boiled and mixed with a portion of cut hay or straw, or bran or ship stuff. Swine fatten on them rapidly, and, when boiled, they are eaten with avidity by poultry. Horses will do as much work on carrot feed, mixed with a proportion of corn, or oats, as they will upon corn or oats alone.

A good, bright, well-enriched sandy loam is the delight of carrots. They do not succeed well on heavy wet soils, and all such should be avoided. If a depth of fifteen inches of good open soil can be selected; and a good dressing of manure given it, equal to that required to produce a fair crop of corn; under all ordinary circumstances, the yield will not be less than from three to four hundred bushels to the acre.

The seed may be sown at almost any time from the 1st of April to the 20th of May. For field culture, it should be sown in drills, an inch in depth; fifteen or eighteen inches apart, the plants being thinned to six inches asunder. All the cultivation required is keeping down the weeds, and the occasional stirring of the soil between the rows. They are preserved for Winter use in the same manner as turnips, rutabagas, etc.

The Long Orange, Altringham, and the White Belgian are the varieties generally selected for field culture. The Long Orange is more largely cultivated than either of the others, though there are many who prefer the White Belgian. Either succeeds well in our soils, and with proper care will yield very remunerative crops—far more remunerative than corn or oats.

It is thought advisable by some growers to sprout the seed before sowing. This is a good plan, and generally gives a fair start to the crop. As the seeds are covered with a rough coat, and are difficult to separate, they should be mixed with common sand, and well rubbed between the hands before sowing. The mixing should be thoroughly done to secure even distribution.

BEETS FOR MILCH COWS.—Farmers who have accurately tested the merits of the different kinds of food for milch cows in Winter, look with favor upon the beet. A test recorded by the Germantown Telegraph gives 7½ pounds of butter per week from a cow, 5 for carrots. In both cases hay and corn fodder were given, as much as was wanted to be eaten. Cut hay and meal were also tried, and produced 6 pounds. Half a bushel of the roots were used a day to each cow. Beets on good soil and properly tended will produce 400 to 500 bushels to the acre. The advantage of raising this crop will at once be seen. Sugar is a prominent property in the beet. It has, specially, a warming influence, and hence is favorable for Winter feed.

SOOT AS MANURE.—Every owner or occupant of a house has a considerable quantity of soot at command, the presence of which in the stove-pipe or chimney is often the cause of destructive fires, causing sometimes loss of property and life. Soot is one of the most valuable manures, and nothing but the most culpable carelessness and indifference will suffer it to remain a standing menace to life and property, when it can be easily removed and turned to good account in the field or garden. Twelve quarts of soot in a hoghead of water will make a powerful liquid manure, which will improve the growth of flowers, garden vegetables, or root crops. In either a liquid or solid state it makes an excellent top-dressing for grass or cereal crops.

HOG CHOLERA.—J. Thompson of Indiana, in the Western Rural, gives the following preventive and cure of this disease: "I would suggest if tar is smeared at the bottom of the troughs in which the hogs are fed, in the proportion of a pint to a trough ten or twelve feet long, and a couple of ounces of flour of sulphur, and some dissolved-salt-peter be mixed with the food daily for a week or more, and chloride of lime sprinkled about the sleeping places, hog cholera may be prevented and cured."

WHEN A HORSE IS UNSOUND.—Any of the following defects constitute unsoundness in a horse: Lameness of all kinds and degrees. Disenses of any of the internal organs. Cough of all kinds so long as it exists. Roaring, broken wind, thick wind, grease, mange, farcy and glanders, megrims or staggers, founder, convex feet, contracted feet, spavins and ringbones, enlargement of the sinews or ligaments, cataracts and other defects of the eyes, impairing sight.

The following may or may not occasion unsoundness, according to the state or degree in which they exist: Corns, splints, thrushes, bog-spavins, thorough-pins, windgalls, crib-biting. Curbs are unsoundness unless the horse has worked with them for some months without inconvenience.

Cutting, particularly speedy cutting, constitutes unsoundness when it cannot be remedied by care and skill. Quidding, when a confirmed habit, injures the soundness of a horse.

Defects called blemishes are: Scars from broken knees, capped hocks, splints, bog-spavins, and thorough-pins; loss of hair, from blisters or scars; enlargements from blows or cutting, and specks or streaks on the corner of the eye.

Vices are: Restiveness, shying, bolting, running away, kicking, rearing, waving or moving the head from side to side, strutting, quidding, slipping the halter.

The receipts at the New Orleans Customhouse, for the month of March, 1867, were $44,415 in gold, and $15,000 in greenbacks.

LATEST FASHIONS.

J. W. BRADLEY'S
DUPLEX ELLIPTICAL
[Or, Double Spring]

SKIRT!

THEY WILL NOT BEND OR BREAK
The Single Spring, but will preserve their perfect and graceful shape when three or four are worn. They are thrown aside as useless—
they are the CHEAPEST.

Each Hoop is made by braiding two springs
together, edge to edge, forming the STRONG-EST, MOST FLEXIBLE, and still the LIGHT-
EST Hoop made.

In fact, for promenade, or the house, or the church, the theatre, or for crowded assemblies,
it is superior to all others, affording COMFORT TO THE WEARER, with that ELEGANCE OF SHAPE
which wins favor with all, and has made this
"DUPLEX ELLIPTIC"

The Standard Skirt of the Fashionable World.
For misses and young ladies they are superior to all others.

For Sale Everywhere.
Solely and exclusively by the owners of the Patent.

WEST, BRADLEY & CARY,
Chambers, 79 and 81 Leade sts, New York.

CAUTION.
The Duplex Skirt will admit a pin being run
through the centre of each hoop, thereby providing two SPRINGS braided together,
which is the secret of their remarkable
LENGTH and FLEXIBILITY—a combination not possessed by any SINGLE-SPRING
skirt.

The red ink stamp, viz: "J. W. BRADLEY'S Duplex Elliptic Skirt," will be found upon each band of every Skirt; none other are genuine.

RANDOLPH MACON COLLEGE, VA.
IN FULL OPERATION.
THIS TIME HONORED INSTITUTION is now more in successful operation, with a FULL CORPS OF PROFESSORS. The chairs of the several schools are filled by able and experienced men. There are the literary and scientific schools, viz: OF ANCIENT LANCET, NATURAL
CHEMISTRY, and NATURAL PHILOSOPHY,
MORAL PHILOSOPHY and MODERN LANG-UAGES. In addition to the above the Board of Trustees have established a school of COM-MERICAL SCIENCE, with the view of giving
to the young men of the country a BUSINESS EDUCATION.

To graduates in all these schools, Diplomas are granted and the degrees of Bachelor of Arts
and Master of Arts are conferred upon students
who accomplish a certain course. The high grade of scholarship formerly enjoyed is still maintained. We have a full CHEMICAL and PHYSIOLOGICAL APPARATUS for the illustration of the sciences taught.

The location of the College is unsurpassed for health and geniality. It is situated midway between the mountains and the seaboard, and
during a career of thirty-three years, and with
thousands of young men in attendance, there
has never been a death arising from malaria or other local cause. We have a full CHEMICAL apparatus, and those desiring to graduate young men not only mentally but physically also.

BOARD IS SIXTEEN DOLLARS PER MONTH. Tuition from $10 to $15, according to the number of schools attended. $250 will cover
expenses of board, tickets for three schools,
matriculation and contingent fees for ten months.
Student provides his own laundry, fuel and lights. Young men who are preparing for the ministry and those desiring to be law men who are unable to pay their tuition, will be allowed
to attend any or all of the schools free of charge.

This College is situated near Dayton, the county seat of Mecklenburg county, Va.
Arrangements are made to transport students
from Ridgway Depot, on the Raleigh and Weldon Railroad, whilst a conveyance leaves Radenoke station, on the Richmond and Danville Railroad, on Mondays, Wednesdays and Fridays,
and the Wolf Trap Depot, on the same route,
Tuesdays, Thursdays and Saturdays.

We solicit a liberal patronage from Maryland,
Virginia and North Carolina, from the West,
South and South West.

Second term will commence on the 1st day of February next. Young men will be received and prepared for the College proper. For further particulars address the undersigned at Dayton, Mecklenburg county, Va.

NEW ORLEANS MARKETS.

From the N. O. Price Current.

The principal feature in the market since our last issue, is the strong reaction in our leading staple, caused by the favorable and pacific tenor of the foreign news, and resulting in sales to a liberal extent at a marked advance in prices. In most other departments of trade there has been increased dullness, accompanied by a decline in several leading articles, including flour, corn and oats.

The decline in Gold, caused by the improvement in 5 20's at London and on the Continent, has had a corresponding influence on Foreign Exchange, the rates of which have materially receded, but at the same time the market has exhibited a more healthy tone, with manifestly increased confidence in commercial bills. Domestic trade has continued extremely quiet, with light offerings, a limited remittance demand, and a decided tendency to easier rates.

COTTON.—We noticed, in our last report that owing to favorable accounts from New York, the market had exhibited a sharp reaction and closed at advanced quotations. On Saturday, the news from New York and Liverpool being encouraging, the sales summed up 4000 bales. On Monday the news that the Prussian Government had acceded to the proposition for a general conference of the great powers to settle the Luxembourg question, and that at both Liverpool and New York, prices had materially advanced, caused an unusual excitement in the market. The sales amounted to 4200 bales. Tuesday the accounts from Liverpool and New York caused an unfavorable reaction. Sales were confined to 1500 bales, at prices according with our quotations.

The receipts proper since Friday evening comprise 2875 bales, against 4440 during the corresponding period last week, showing a decrease of 1565 bales.

The receipts at this port, since the 1st of September, (exclusive of the arrivals from Mobile, Florida and Texas), are 659,437 bales, against 619,251 bales to same date last year, and the decrease in the receipts at all the ports, up to the latest dates, as compared with last year, is 134,971 bales. In the exports from the United States to foreign countries, as compared with the same dates last year, there is a decrease of 75,466 bales to Great Britain, of 47,895 to France, and an increase of 35,184 bales to other foreign ports.

Monetary.

The Money Market continues without any great variation, but both Gold and Foreign Exchange have materially given way under pacific news from Europe, the former showing a net decline during the past three days of 3c per dollar. The resources of the banks and private bankers are mostly absorbed in Exchange operations, but they discount a moderate amount of sixty days' business paper for their regular customers.

EXCHANGE.—Sterling may be quoted at 143 1/2 to 144 for bill of lading bills, 146 to 146 1/2 for A1 commercial, and 148 to 148 1/2 for private bankers' and bank; and France at 392 1/2 to 390 for A1 commercial, and 385 for bank.

Both the supply and demand for Domestic Exchange has been limited, and the market has steadily ruled in favor of buyers, the banks checking on New York at 38 per cent. premium, and commercial eight ruling at par to 18 premium, one day's sight at par.

WHOLE NUMBER 620.

NEW ORLEANS, SATURDAY, MAY 11, 1867.

OFFICE—112 CAMP STREET.

BRITISH HONDURAS.

Mr. James M. Putnam, recently of New Orleans, but now a colonial agent, Col. R. W. Graham, formerly of Kentucky, but recently of Texas, Mr. Dudley Adams, formerly of Tennessee, but recently of Arkansas, and I left New Orleans on the 19th of March to explore British Honduras. Having devoted six weeks faithfully and laboriously to arduous work, for the accomplishment of which we were highly rewarded with facilities that enabled us to acquire as much information of the country in that length of time as we could have gained in six months elsewhere; and there, to either having freely interchanged views, and unanimously concurring in our opinions of the country and its resources, I now report to the benefit of our Southern people.

Mr. Putnam—who is deservedly held in high estimation there—included us, as representatives of the great many Southern families, to the Excellency, Governor Austin, and all the prominent citizens of Belize, who extended to us the most cordial welcome, and unanimously expressed the warmest sympathy for our Confederate people in their fortunate situation, and assured that they wished we would immigrate to their Colony, where we could repair our ruined fortunes, and enjoy our homes under a friendly Government; and we have abundant evidences of their sincerity. I have never met with a more warm-hearted and liberal-minded people in all my travels.

The Creoles and the Caribs—the whole population received us everywhere with marked politeness, and friendly kindness; and universally expressed their earnest desire that our Southern people would settle in the country, that they might assist them in developing their agricultural and other resources. To me some idea of the kindness and hospitality of the citizens of British Honduras, I must be permitted to state some of their generous offers to us.

The Governor being in the Northern District, with the "Enterprise" government service, (and it being the only steamer in the colony) the Hon. Antonio Mathe provisioned one of his schooners sumptuously, and accompanied us about 50 miles to his sugar estate at "Allman's," where we were honorably entertained with his "Bonnie Blue Flag" sailing over us while we were most agreeably entertained by himself and his agent, Mr. Blyke's family, and furnished horses to ride, and a boat with oarsmen to ascend the river Sitto, and on another occasion, Mr. Mathe and Mr. Hempstead assisted their boat, and Mr. Usher, Assistant Crown Surveyor, accompanied us about thirty miles, and walked with us about twenty miles, showing the lands about lake Mathe. While we were down exploring the Southern District, the Hon. Philip Toledo, returned from an incipient sugar estate at Seven Hills, to Belize, and learning from Mr. Putnam (who had been detained on important business) that we were about looking at the country for Southern friends, and the "Enterprise" having returned to Belize, he chartered the steamer and procured it sumptuously, and he and Mr. Putnam came down and met us while sailing round from Dup River, up which we had been exploring, and Monkey river, and saluting us with their flag; they rounded to and took us on board the steamer, which kept down there with row boat and six oarsmen, ten days; while Mr. Swayze very kindly procured guides, and walked with us day after day exploring the country; Mr. Toledo all the while insisting that we allow ourselves plenty of time to examine the lands and rivers regardless of his expenses.

When we went up into the Northern District, J. H. Philip, Esq., requested Mr. Dunn, (a very clever and obliging gentleman, connected with his business,) to accompany us and procure horses at Caledonia, (a large sugar estate he is commencing up on New River,) and conduct us through the country, etc.

At Corozal, Mr. Carmichael entertained us very hospitably, and furnished us with horses to ride out to see his sugar estate and others. Near Orange Walk, Mr. Oswald, received us kindly, and entertained us in a warm cordial manner. After we had spent the night with him and ridden over his sugar estate, which bears the name of "Trial Farm," he furnished us horses to ride about five miles above Orange Walk, to Mr. Price's place called "Tower Hill," where we were very kindly entertained by Mr. Price, formerly from Louisiana, who has an excellent sugar estate. After riding over his plantation, and back in the country far enough to see the character of it, he outfitted his row boat with oarsmen, etc., to convey us about twenty-five miles up to Indian Church; but as he had examined the country before settling his place three years ago, and gave us a full description of it, and as we would barely have time to go up there and back, by traveling all night to meet the steamer, we declined the excursion.

The Governor of the Colony, and all the people, everywhere, complimented us with assurances of decided partiality for our Confederate people, to whom the hand of true friendship is now extended in real earnest, to receive us with open arms and warm hearts. The Governor offers all the Crown lands, for actual settlement and occupation, on the following terms: no payment required for the first five years; after that time we must pay $1 per acre, annually, for the next five years; but he agrees to appropriate three-fourths of the money for the public improvement of the locality for which it was paid. Thus virtually we get Crown lands for $1 per acre, on ten years time without any interest. Most of the balance of the lands are held by the British Honduras Company, and Philip Toledo & Co.

The British Honduras Company had already agreed to let Mr. Putnam have their lands at fifty cents per acre on five years time, without interest. Mr. Toledo lets us have about 150,000 acres at 37½ cents per acre, on one, two, and three years time without interest. Mr. Mathe lets us have 17,280 acres for $6,000, on one, two, and three years, with 6 per cent. interest after the first year. These lands are subject to cost of survey and some other expenses. We ask no profit, and have no intention whatever to speculate on our Southern friends.

The Government is mild, but efficient. There is a Governor appointed by the Crown of Great Britain, and a House of Assembly composed of twenty-one members, three of whom are appointed by the Governor, and eighteen elected by the people. All the other officers of the Colonial Government are appointed by the Crown and hold office during good behavior. Crime is almost unknown. It is literally true that good order prevails universally, and person and property are safe everywhere.

To become well acquainted with the climate, health, soil, productions, and the population of British Honduras we labored diligently and faithfully for six weeks; and by the great facilities of steamboat, sail and row boats with oarsmen, and guides put at our command by those noble people, we succeeded in gathering as much knowledge of the country in that length of time as we could have gained in six months without them.

The Colony is between 17 and 19 degrees north latitude, fronting east about 200 miles on the Caribbean sea, and extending about 70 miles back west. The Sarstoon, navigable 80 miles, is the southern boundary between British Honduras and Guatemala; and the Rio Hondo, navigable 75 or 80 miles, is the northern boundary between it and Yucatan. There are thirteen other rivers, navigable for greater or less distances, in the Colony, arising about the western border, and running parallel eastwardly, emptying into the Bay of Honduras. We ascended those rivers as high as we could in steamboat, and then in light canoes, stopping along at intervals and walking out across about half way to the next river. Having thus examined one river, we would come out and go round into the next one, which was examined in the same manner; and thus we proceeded to explore the whole country.

CLIMATE. We found the climate very pleasant, notwithstanding we were there in what is called the dry season, which is the hottest in the year. The thermometer ranged from 76 to 88, Fahrenheit. We walked at all hours of the day in the open fields and dense forests, but we found the temperature so modified by the constant sea-breezes that it was much less oppressive than the heat of summer which we had experienced in the Southern States. The nights are always pleasantly cool and bracing. The thermometer never rises above 90, nor falls below 60—ranging generally from 75 to 80.

We were informed by a planter, formerly from Louisiana, but who had been planting in the Colony three years, that the seasons there are about as they are in the Southern States. But from December to May is the driest season, yet there is more or less rain during that time. About the latter part of May or June good rains fall; and then about the latter part of June a few heavy rains fall, mostly at night only; then again the weather is moderately seasonable for a month or so; then heavier rains fall again in September and October, and lighter until the latter part of November; but the rains fall generally in the night, and the days are clear. In all our rambles we did not see half a dozen trees blown down by wind; nor one stricken by lightning.

HEALTH. From what we saw, experienced, and learned we are satisfied that the country is very healthy—more so than our Southern States. The prevailing diseases are very mild and amenable to treatment. In our perambulations through the country we walked in the morning dew and midday sun, and slept in the night air with no other couch or covering than the ground or sky. We would get quite cold in the night; but we would button up our coats and sleep coolly. And though thus exposed our health even improved.

We have never seen such perfectly developed men and women as those natives are; and they are complete pictures of perfect health. The European population who went there in good health, have ever since enjoyed almost uninterrupted health as they assured us, and appeared to have done. Generally those who went there in feeble health assured us they had recuperated, and enjoyed better health than formerly. We believe that our Southern people emigrating to British Honduras would experience no bad effects from the transition; but in many instances, would find the climate beneficial to their health.

SOIL. The soil in the south half of the Colony resembles that on the Brazos river in Texas, the Arkansas river, and the Red river. It is a rich red loam to a very great depth, nearly everywhere covered with Caloon growth, which is indicative of the best productive qualities. The rivers run parallel, and are distant about 6 to 10 and 15 miles apart, and navigable in lowest water 12 to 20 miles, and much further up 6 or 8 months in the year. Most of them are liable once a year to overflow their banks down within three or four miles of the sea coast. Some of these overflow the margin of their banks even a greater distance than that up from their mouths. But they don't overflow every year; and when they do spread out over the adjacent lands the water remains only a very few hours before it retires, leaving an alluvial deposit. And in many places a levee eighteen inches or two feet high would protect even the front lands from overflow; and levees much lower than have been required in Louisiana would reclaim the whole country from inundation. Plantains which are a very valuable product, as well as Bananas and other productions, are not injured at all by an overflow which subsides in so short time. There are no intervening swamps between the rivers; on the contrary the intervening lands are elevated higher than the margins of the rivers even. And there are excellent creeks of pure water every mile or two; and the same quality of rich soil throughout generally. Excellent roads may be established from one river to another at proper distances, and settlements be made on them as well as on the rivers. Such is the character of the eastern half of the southern District. It is level river bottom generally. The western half is high, elevated lands, terminating abruptly in mountain peaks, which crop out on the river plains just described. All those lands even to the summits of the towering hills are of the same quality of soil, very rich and productive. The hill lands would be preferable for Coffee, which grows well there, and is of course very profitable.

In the northern half of the Colony the lands are very level, and intersected with rivers and bayons, which are also navigable, but never overflow their banks. The soil is a rich black mould with a slight admixture of black sand, very similar to the soil on the Mississippi river and the Atchafalaya. But in the north eastern quarter of the northern District the soil is underlaid with a white marl, about the color and consistence of chalk, which is from eighteen inches to three and five feet below the surface; further west and south the black mould becomes deeper until the marl ceases or is displaced by rich red clay. The soil in the whole of British Honduras, with very limited exceptions, is as rich and productive as can be found anywhere on earth. The lands are in large bodies. There is more good lands and less waste lands than we have ever found in any other country. There is plenty of rich productive soil in the Colony to sustain, in great abundance, all our good Confederate people, for whom we now hold it at cost, and invite them to come and occupy it with us.

PRODUCTIONS. I would almost be afraid to tell the whole truth about the productions of British Honduras, if I could; for really they are so numerous, so abundant, and so valuable that a full account of them would appear fabulous. There are many valuable woods for various purposes—mahogany, rose-wood, santamaria, cabbage stalk tree, (the last two resembling the white oak), cedar, of enormous size and superior qualities, sapadilla, a red and very heavy wood and valuable timber, large pitch pine, lignum vitae, white mangrove, etc., etc.

There is a great variety of fruits, such as plantains, bananas, coconuts, oranges, pine apples, lemons, limes, mangoes, cashews, star apples, custard apples, avocata pears, plums, figs, cherries, grapes, etc., etc., amounting to some fifty different kinds, and besides the various vegetables produced in the Southern States, the yams, yampas, coco, casava, etc., etc.

The products are really wonderful. The industrious husbandman may calculate safely on being rewarded for his very moderate labor, with, at least 20 bushels of clean rice per acre, twice a year, 30 or 40 bushels of corn per acre, twice a year, 5 to 7 hogsheads of sugar per acre, and the cane will rattoon 15 to 20 years. A superior quality of cotton grows there; the stalk is perennial and continues to grow and yield for years. I saw some stalks four or five years old, and white with cotton in March, while there were also blossoms, and young forms and bolls at all stages of growth. I exhibited some, the other day which I gathered myself, to Mr. J. P. Harrison, Sr., a well known Commission Merchant in New Orleans, (formerly of the firm of Payne & Harrison,) who assured me he could sell it for fifty cents in New Orleans at that time. Tobacco grows there equal to any perhaps in Cuba. Indigo grows to perfection there. Coffee also thrives and yields well, and is of excellent quality. We saw trees there healthy looking, and full of blossoms. Mr. Binny showed us some coffee of very superior quality which grew near by. There are a great many other valuable staples produced there, of which I will give further accounts soon.

I will leave to-morrow on the steamer "Trade Wind" with my family to make my future home in British Honduras. The Government has chartered the "Trade Wind," to run regularly between Belize and New Orleans. She will leave New Orleans on the 7th and 25th of May; and thereafter she will leave New Orleans the fourth Saturday in every month. Mr. Dowd, the Agent, 110 Poydras street, New Orleans, assures me that he will have another larger steamer also on the route in about a month. So that there will soon be one steamship leaving New Orleans every two weeks for Belize. Rates of passage and freights as follows: cabin passage $50, in coming down, but up in gold; freights in gold per bbl., $1 for dry, and $1 50 for wet; per cubic foot 25c for boxes, with 5 per cent. joilage.

The best time for immigrants to move to British Honduras, is from the first of December to the first of May. That is the dryer season of the year, and more agreeable for camping until houses can be built. But a house that will answer all necessary purposes can be put up by three or four hands in a week; for it is only necessary to shelter from the sun and rain, as there is no cold weather from which protection will be required. Most of the houses through the country at present are thatched with either the Bayleaf or the Caloon, which make a roof that is water proof, and will last many years. Planters immigrating now even may be able to provide shelters for their families, and open and plant land enough to produce an ample supply for next year.

Horses and mules, of rather small size, however, may be bought there at from $35 to $75. But large oxen unbroken, can be had for $15 or $20; but well trained will cost from $25 to $40. As fine hogs as any country affords can be had for about $8. Goats can be had reasonably. There are but few sheep there yet; although they do well.

Immigrants had better take their plows suitable for newly cleared lands, and wagons or carts; but all other implements can be had there better than here. Excepting flour, and pork, supplies can be bought there cheaper than here.

Mr. Adams will remain in the United States till next fall, and visit Tennessee and Arkansas. Any interrogations addressed to him to the care of Dr. J. C. Keener, 112 Camp street, New Orleans, will be promptly replied to.

My address, will be Belize, British Honduras. I will take pleasure in giving any additional information that may be sought of me.

RELIGIOUS NEWS.

The British and Foreign Bible Society has 9,616 societies in connection with it. At its organization in 1804, there were about fifty translations of the Bible in whole or in part; it has aided translations in 173 languages and dialects; has distributed 50,285,709 copies of the Scriptures; and other societies, which have received grants in aid from it, have run up the total to more than $6,000,000. It carries on its work in languages spoken by 600,000,000 of the human race.

There is a striking contrast between the Italy of 1861 and 1867. Great things have been wrought for her within a period of six years. In 1861 the Bible could not be purchased in all Italy, outside of Sardinia and Lombardy. No religion except that of Rome was permitted. There were no schools; the people were debased in ignorance; crime abounded; beggars and priests swarmed everywhere; there were mendicant friars and nuns to the number of one hundred thousand, who ate out the substance of the people; bishops, archbishops, churches, colleges, monastic institutions, held nearly all the wealth of the country; commerce was dead; agriculture languished; there were no manufactures worthy of the name. The pulsations of life were all but gone from the heart of this classic land—strangled by the Church of Rome. In 1867, 18,000,000 Italians rejoice in political and religious freedom; the monasteries have disappeared or been converted to better uses; Papal anathemas have lost their terror; sixty thousand schools offer free education to all the children of the land. Evangelical religion is protected by law, and the Bible is an open book. All Italy, in fact, with the exception of Rome, is open to the reception of the Gospel.

The American and Foreign Christian Union has fifteen young men at Milan, now in course of training for the work of Italian evangelization. The number would be greater if the requisite funds were supplied.

HUNGARY.—It appears that the Hungarian Diet is inclined to grant some protection to Protestants. A Protestant called George Skraban recently petitioned the Diet that his son, aged nine years, who had been violently abducted and placed in a Roman Catholic Orphan Asylum at Guns, should be restored to him. It appears that on his marriage he had signed a bond written in Hungarian—a language which, as a Wende, he did not understand—pledging himself to bring up his children in the Roman Catholic faith. The House declared—and the decision is of considerable importance, considering the multitudes of such bonds that exist—that such pledges are not binding under any circumstances whatever, and referred the petition to the Minister of Justice.

FRANCE.—At the great International Exposition there will be a special Bible stand, similar to, but larger and more imposing than that set up in the open air, opposite the Great Dome of the International Exhibition building of 1862 in London. Thence will flow forth a stream of light and blessing. More than 24,000 have been raised for this special agency; and Bibles, New Testaments, and Portions (separate books and gospels) will be given away—without money and without price—like the salvation they proclaim to men of many tongues—French, Spanish, Italian, German, and other languages—including a special department for giving the Scriptures to the Jewish race.

Dynamics Laws of the Mississippi River.

Mr. Editor: It has been said that misfortunes never come single. Now whether the proposition be invariably true, or debatable, it is most intensely true with regard to the people of Louisiana, especially those on the low lands west of the Mississippi.

A few years ago floods of men inundated that country, and transformed the most fertile and beautiful country on the face of the earth into a dreary waste, covered with smoking ruins. The people were paralyzed, they viewed with amazement the destruction of their homes, and long cherished hopes, and for a moment were unnerved and helpless. It was but for a moment, but the agony of that moment was terrible. But such indomitable spirits could not be long repressed. For a moment they reminded us of Milton's description of the fallen spirits when they first found themselves on the surface of the burning lake—too much amazed at their misfortune to realize their condition or feel the anguish inflicted by the flames around them; and like Milton's spirits they soon arose in arms, not to conquer the enemy that destroyed their homes, but the specter that haunted them by day and night—the want of bread. Gathering up the fragments of their ruined fortunes they entered the conflict; but wave after wave of water, and caterpillars, like the waves of a troubled sea, rose higher and higher each succeeding year, until they have attained their final and fatal culmination in the present flood. The scanty means left them by their previous misfortunes are exhausted in the effort; they must now abandon the country or perish. The power that enabled them heretofore to control the water has ceased to exist. The voice that once said to the mighty waters thus far, and no farther shalt thou go, is hushed in eternal silence. No human effort or engineering skill can preserve the country from ultimate and utter ruin. An inexorable law of nature which has been operating for unnumbered ages, and still continues to operate with unabated if not increasing force, has asserted its prerogative, and bids defiance to the opposition of human genius.

For many years the success of planters in securing portions of land now submerged, gave hopes to many of final success. But that which they believed to be a cure, was but a palliative, which instead of curing the disease, was absorbing the vitality of the system and hastening the dissolution. But the system has lost its excitability, it no longer responds to the remedy, and the hand which so long administered the controlling anodyne is hopelessly, and forever paralyzed.

The time was when the blast of an overseer's horn, or the tap of a plantation bell, when a crevasse was threatened, would summon hundreds, or if necessary, thousands, to the scene of real, or threatened disaster, armed with all the implements and appliances necessary for the conflict, commanded by men whose word was law, and whose presence and skill were guarantees of success,—by what means I leave to the future historian of our ruined country to tell.

But my object in commencing this communication was to prove, that the God of nature by the operation of unalterable laws, has fixed, and sealed the doom of all that country. Even if no disaster consequent upon human agency had befallen the country, the mechanical and geological laws governing the movement and transposition of matter by the immemorial economy of the great river, if much longer restrained by lakes and levees, would ultimately overwhelm the whole alluvial plain, and convert it into a boundless marsh. No engineering, no science, no human effort can avert the inevitable and final catastrophe. As if enraged at the manacles with which it has been bound for so many years, it seems now determined in its majesty and might, to assert its dominion over the country it has made.

Many years ago a series of articles appeared in some of the newspapers of this State, from the pen of a civil engineer of some celebrity, essaying to prove, that if all the outlets were closed, and the banks levied, that the river would dig for itself a channel, and by what he was pleased to call a scouring process, and in condescension to science create capacity commensurate with its wants. He seemed to think, and speak, as if accident had partially filled the channel, and that the current that was to scour it out was perfectly pure. The thought never seems to have occurred to him, that the sand in the bottom of the river was brought down by the current, and that the quantity supplied increased with the advance of civilization towards its source; that the sediment which originally built up its banks, and was annually spread over the whole alluvial plain, is now deposited in the bottom, or borne onward to the ocean. But as no one has observed any change in the constituents of the water in the lower Mississippi, nor of the composition of the deposit on its banks, the conclusion is forced upon us that it goes to the bottom. Indeed, who ever attentively observes the structure of the bank at low water, will be unable to resist the conviction that the banks have been slowly and gradually rising for many centuries, and that the bottom and banks have through all time maintained the same relative height. They will observe the banks stratified from the surface of the water to the top, indicating not only the deposit from successive overflows, but the sources from which they came. Black, yellow and red, as the flood from different tributaries predominated. I have seen in the bottom of the river Plaquemine, from twenty to thirty feet below the present surface, the stumps of cypress trees still standing where they grew, with their roots so firmly fixed in the ground, that the current at flood, with a fall of more than twelve inches to the mile, was insufficient to move them.

In summing up, then, all the historical and geological facts at our command on the subject, we arrive at the inevitable conclusion that the whole country now submerged must be abandoned. The present condition of the Euphrates, the Tigris, the Nile and the Po, may be useful to us in studying the economy of our own great river. The lower valley of the Euphrates, which in the days of Babylon's glory, sustained a population more dense than England or Belgium, is now a waste of water at flood time, and in time of low water a wilderness of reeds and crocodiles, and the channel which once gave passage to the navies of the world is now so choked with sand as scarcely to afford navigation for a fishing smack.

Such would be the condition of the valley of the lower Nile, but for the wise engineering of the Egyptians. Who instead of restraining the flood by banks and dikes, created that wonderful labyrinth of artificial channels which still exists, to absorb the surplus water or give it exit to the ocean. And such would be the condition of the Po, but for the stability of the papal government, and absolute power with which labor is commanded, and such must be our condition under the present system.

It is neither reasonable nor philosophical to suppose, that a law of nature which has governed matter and motion from the beginning, will be suspended to accommodate either our theories or our wishes.

I have written the above to point out some land marks which may guide others in their reflections on the subject; fully satisfied that the same relations heretofore existing between cause and effect still exist, and will continue to exist till the laws of nature are revoked, and the material universe is reconstructed.

REFUGEE.

It is a recent discovery that, if a stable is kept clean, cows will go into it of their own accord. If dirty, they will have to be driven in.

MEMORIAL SERVICE FOR BISHOP SOULE.

A service commemorative of the late Bishop Soule, was held on the occasion of the meeting of the Bishops and others in Nashville, Sunday afternoon, April 14. McKendree Church was draped with mourning and filled with persons, many of whom were from a distance. The exercises were conducted by the colleagues of the late senior Bishop. After a voluntary by the choir, Bishop Pierce read Psalm xc. and Rev. vii. 9-17. Bishop Doggett read the hymn, "Servant of God, well done!" a part of which was sung. Bishop Early offered an impressive prayer. He was followed by Bishop Wightman, who gave a most admirable portrait of the character of Bishop Soule, which we have the pleasure of presenting to our readers. Bishops Andrew, Paine, and Early, made a few pertinent remarks, having special reference to the official character of Bishop Soule, and his uniform courtesy and kindness in his intercourse with his colleagues. These testimonials to the late Bishop were beautiful and affecting. The service closed with a prayer by Bishop Marvin, the doxology, and a benediction by Bishop McTyeire.

ADDRESS OF BISHOP WIGHTMAN.

"And they glorified God in me," said St. Paul of himself. The precedent is a safe one, in the case of all good men; it eminently justifies a similar procedure in reference to one of St. Paul's successors in the chief oversight of one of the largest of the modern Churches of Christ; who was formed on the Pauline model; was converted by the Pauline gospel; drank deeply of the Pauline spirit; walked in the heroic steps of that great traveling-preacher of the primitive Church whose circuits embraced half continents—the sound of whose preaching has come down to us through the echoing ages—the force of whose great life throbs in the heart of our own time. Very rightly, wisely, and worthily, may we thus glorify God. A great man, fully consecrated to Christ, living out in the face of the sun through nearly three generations, a life of holy zeal, unwearying labors, eminent usefulness; a life of untiring benevolence, of unbending integrity, of comprehensive single aim; the governing law of which has been an uncompromising sense of duty; the divine beauty of which has been marred by no blot, though subjected to the inspection of keen-sighted criticism;—this product of the grace of God deserves, demands a tribute of praise to God. It is an exemplification of the truth and power of religion which we cannot afford to let pass into oblivion. It is a manifestation—imperfect, indeed, and with many an abatement, yet a real manifestation of the quality of the Divine Excellence. It is a product of redeeming power, and love, and wisdom, exhibiting the shining signatures of a divine origination; declaring, no less than the heavens, "the glory of God." It is from this point of view that, at the solicitation of my brethren, I attempt a brief sketch of the character of my late honored and lamented friend, Bishop Soule, as it presented itself to my own observation, omitting those biographical details which have so recently and so felicitously been made from this pulpit, and in the columns of the official organ of the Church.

Bishop Soule presided at that session of the South Carolina Conference at which I was admitted on trial in the traveling ministry. He was, as a matter of course, an object of great interest to all young preachers; and to form a personal acquaintance with him was an event, I might say an epoch, in one's earlier life. The first thing that struck an observer was his noble physique. Stalwart, massive, athletic—nature had cast him in her noblest mould of manly perfection. He seemed to be a born commander; by nature's patent of nobility another Agamemnon, "king of men." His eye had the glance of an eagle's. He walked with the alertness and speed of an Indian. His stride left ordinary pedestrians far in the rear. His grip held like a vice. He had the prowess of a lion-hearted man, the puissance, force of an overmastering energy. He feared nothing—allowed no man to go where he could not follow—made his way in the pathless wilderness; drove his carriage, once at least, over a swollen river; by his sheer audacity cowed an angry Indian with a rifle in his hands; and drove from a camp-ground a gang of ruffians. He had faced and held at bay peril in almost every form. He realized in appearance, figure, attitude, mien, one's ideal of a great man. When he rose he seemed, in his symmetry and strength, as though he really had "a muscular consciousness of the round world beneath him, and stood, statue-like, surmounting its broad curvatures."

His intellectual, moral, and religious qualities seemed to correspond with this noble physique. Here, too, every thing was broad, deep, massive; every thing in symmetry and grand proportion. There were more rapid thinkers; there were scholars many, with stores of erudition to which he made no pretension; here and there were to be found preachers with imagination more vivid—a pomp and flow of language more magnificent; but in momentum—sheer weight and mighty strength, you had to look far to find his peer, among the foremost men of his time. He suggested to my young fancy, when I first knew him, the picture of a mountain-range, the backbone of a continent. I thought of the sea when it was lifting its swell, and moving its mass of waters. In the few sermons I had the privilege to hear from him, years ago, there was this peculiarity, that the intellectual movement was at first cautious and slow, at least very deliberate, as if it were the reconnaissance of a general surveying the field on the eve of battle; before the wheeling of the squadrons, the advance of the column, and the thunder of the artillery. But his foundation-propositions being laid down and argued, as he advanced you saw that an avalanche was getting in motion, gradually speeding its progress by its own mass and power, as it came on; until at last, with resistless momentum, it swept every thing from its path. Thus Dr. Few, of Georgia, described to me the effect produced on his mind by the great sermon preached by Bishop Soule in Augusta, in 1827, which I did not hear. This was my own mind affected by the close of each one of the Bishop's sermons which it was my privilege to listen to. I seem even now to see his majestic form, his beaming face, the glance of his eye, moistened by strong emotion, and his outspread arms, as though he would take the assembly with him to the Cross. I almost fancy I hear the very tones of his sonorous voice, tremulous with concentrated tenderness and passion. The impression left was not that of wonder at the display of a magnificent intellect or a gorgeous imagination; or that of admiration of a highly elaborated presentation of some grand theme of Christian oratory. Quite otherwise. No listener could for a moment think that the preacher was aiming at dramatic effect. Here was a great mind, usually calm and self-possessed, now intensely moved by what is most solid, most real, and momentous in the very substance of the gospel. This emotion, the result of an unctious from above, had power enough to send a sympathizing throb through the bosoms of a thousand listeners.

I remember hearing Bishop Soule and Dr. Emory preach—the one in the morning, the other in the afternoon, of the same Sunday.—The one sermon by the side of the other seemed to my youthful apprehension as some princely mansion, with its halls of grandeur, and its battlemented towers, with garden, and park, and forest background, and the broad azure of heaven overhead, compared with a trim, neat cottage, with rose and woodbine blooming at its door. A maturer judgment might have made the difference less. I heard Bishop Hedding preach but twice, but I never thought of comparing those sermons with Bishop Soule's.

In the administration of the affairs of a great connectional Church, involving the stationing of such a number of preachers, the highest qualities are unquestionably demanded. Clear intellect, strong sense, sagacity to read men, brobity, largeness of view, and singleness of purpose, are constantly put in requisition. The character of Bishop Soule combined these qualities in a remarkable degree, and fitted him for the position of a successor of Ashbury. Here was one who could draw the bow of Ulysses. Nobody doubted that he was an apostolic man, in temper, spirit, communion with God, love of perishing souls, self-sacrificing devotion to the Church of Christ. The interests entrusted to his hand and dependent on his skill and fidelity, under the blessing of God, were as momentous as the eternal destinies of the souls of men, and taxed the highest possibilities of thought, sympathy, exertion, and endurance, on his part. "Sir," said he to the President of the General Conference at which he was first elected Bishop, "your vote this day has made my wife virtually a widow, and my children fatherless." And so to a large extent it was. In accepting the office of a General Superintendent, in the vigorous and expanding Methodism of a time before the existence of rail roads and steamers, he had to surrender almost entirely the enjoyments of home, the society of family and kindred, and give himself up, soul and body, to the toilsome, perilous, thought-consuming, spirit-wearing responsibilities of his holy vocation. "Did Methodism," says Isaac Taylor, "make Europe and America its own to so great an extent as it did, by the sending out of youths—preachers who had more fire than beard? Did the founders of Methodism, did those true heroes and martyrs of the modern Church—did they sit in committee, with maps and plans before them, and thence from their chairs of ease trumpet the question, 'Who, will go for us?' It was not so. These great men—great they were in energy and courage—went themselves. They never said to others, 'Go, and we will follow you,' but 'Always—we go—follow us, and help us!'"

Chairs of ease! What a story could Bishop Soule have told the noble-hearted, eloquent Isaac Taylor, of that chair of ease—his saddle, and that companion of his toils and adventures—his saddle-horse "Hero"—a Virginia thorough-bred, that I once saw myself. On this horse the Bishop made five tours of the Continent, traveling in the saddle 26,000 miles! I yield to no man in admiration of an energy, and courage, and endurance like this.

Bishop Soule's name has sometimes been mentioned with that of the Duke of Wellington. It has struck me that there was one notable point of resemblance between the two men—a sense of duty.—This was the culminating point in the character of the great captain—a trait which his countrymen will glory in with increasing admiration, as generations pass away—the very crown of his glory.—I see the same distinguishing trait in the American Bishop. If in the one case this sense of duty was the result of a high standard of honor, or of careful ethical training in childhood, in the other it was the product of Christian principle and motive. It mattered nothing to Bishop Soule where duty was to lead him; what it was to demand of him; what dangers and sacrifices it was to involve. It was enough that his conscience once recognized a thing as a matter of duty, and then the world could not move him. It became to him a sovereign law of action that nothing could arrest. This high, clear, pervading sense of responsibility keeps the mental and moral equilibrium undisturbed, no matter what intensity of active zeal may mark the life, no matter what obloquy may befall, or acclamations of praise may resound. This is the soul of all genuine humility, for after we have done all, so far from having transcended the requirements of duty, it becomes us to say with earnest self-humiliation, "we are unprofitable servants." This trait of character was beautifully exemplified by Bishop Soule.

Near the close of the General Conference held in 1840, at Baltimore, I was looking on with interest, when Dr. Newton, the distinguished delegate from the British Conference, was requested to suggest the name of some American minister to be sent as a representative to England. The Doctor rose from his seat in the chancel, and Bishop Soule, who was sitting in the pulpit at the time, rose also, and leaning on his elbow, looked down on the scene. Dr. Newton very handsomely acknowledged the compliment, and then in terms highly laudatory, nominated Bishop Soule. My eye was at the instant upon the Bishop, and I was amazed to see how suddenly, as if struck by an unlooked-for shot, he disappeared. He was, beyond all doubt, the very man Dr. Newton ought to have selected; but I felt very sure at the time that Bishop Soule expected nothing of the sort. He spent six months in California in 1853, and preached, on week-days as well as Sundays, every where, from the coast-mountains to the mining region—for in that climate he seemed to have renewed his youth. During his stay in San Francisco, he was the guest of the Governor of the State, by his special invitation. I have no doubt Bishop Soule accepted this distinguished courtesy with a grace and dignity worthy of his office. But I feel very sure, that so far as mere personal considerations went, he would not have turned his hand for a choice between a palace and a cottage. I have heard my friend Dr. Wadsworth describe very graphically, a little passage of arms which occurred between the Bishop and Dr. W., one of the prominent members of the Virginia Conference, at one of the sessions of that Conference, years ago. Dr. W. had made a speech of considerable severity, scattering charges right and left, and finally charged the presiding Bishop with being a party to a conspiracy for the purpose of "chasing him down." "Sir," said the Doctor, addressing the chair at the close, "I shall bring you before the Virginia public in the papers." Bishop Soule immediately and promptly said with quiet dignity: "And I now tell you, Doctor, that I shall not write the scratch of a pen in reply." This, I dare say, is a fair specimen of the style in which he met many of the rubs to which public life exposed him.

The ascendancy which this great man wielded over the minds of others, was due to the colossal force and grandeur of his character, very little to his mere office. It was not so much as an orator or a statesman in Church affairs, that he moved men, as by the moral stature, the lofty spirit, the noble energy of goodness, the beauty of the heroism, the sublimity of such a character as his. Over and beyond all he did, there was what was. It was a great thing for the Church that the example of an excellence so shining, by the truth and grace of Christ, should be before the face of all men. It was a great thing for young preachers that they should thus be able to look upward and train themselves in habits of reverence and admiration, imbibing a portion of the qualities admired.—How far the force of that grand, solemn life reached, and will still reach, in remote and ultimate consequences must be a study for eternity.—There can be no doubt of the fact that in the case of multitudes of preachers, the influence of Bishop Soule's commanding character has been felt, is still felt, coloring thought and sentiment, affecting the laws of feeling, touching the springs of action.

How characteristic was his message to the Bishops, his colleagues: "Push forward the great work." We might put this as a motto on all our seals. It reminds us of one of the latest battle-words of John Wesley: "Let us have one more stroke at Satan's kingdom!" The veteran leader whose arm was once sinewy and strong, whose voice was heard at the head of the host, whose towering crest gleamed in the thick of the battle, now about to leave for ever the field of his early conflicts and triumphs, sends his last words to his well-loved comrades—"push forward the great work." What great work? Ah, you know what great work he meant—the salvation of the souls of men through the instrumentality of the unaltered gospel, by the maintenance of the doctrine and discipline, the spirit and effort, embraced in the original mission of Methodism: O this great work! The times passing over us, the generations to come, the solemn eternity—all re-echo, all give meaning and emphasis to these farewell words of our illustrious leader, now with God—"push forward the great work!"

Let us glorify God who would save to this eminent servant his original faculties with which he was endowed, and the grace to sanctify them and consecrate them to the highest ends of human existence. Let us glorify God for the honor put upon our departed father and friend, in giving him a position so conspicuous in the progress of the most remarkable revival of religion known to modern times, and placed upon him so large a measure of the unction of the Holy Ghost, and made him an instrument so fit for proclaiming and conserving, and extending those divine truths which from the beginning have now have commanded the hearts of men. Let us give God glory for the serene evening of his life, his laborious day, and the triumphant death which closed it, and the bright, and honored, and blessed memories it has bequeathed the Church. "Let us walk by the same rule and mind the same things."

BLINDNESS OF MIND.—When we stifle the convictions of conscience and play with a thing so sacred as truth, they are left to reap as they sow, a conscience that is seared, and to be more ready to embrace falsehood than truth.

Charles Wesley's polemic writings evince his devotion to religious truths, and the zeal with which he was ever ready to maintain them. Especially was his gentle soul roused to anger by the Calvinistic dogma of predestination, against which he was ever ready to aim his keenest shafts. From our beautiful hymn commencing:

"Equip me for the war," we find by far the larger part has been omitted in our hymn book, among which are the following stanzas, which probably constitute the most perfect specimen of controversial poetry in our language:

"Increase (if that can be)
The perfect hate I feel
To Satan's horrible decree,
That genuine child of hell;
Which feigns thee to pass by
The most of Adam's race,
And leave them in their blood to die,
Shut out from saving grace.

"To most, as devils teach,
(Get thee behind me, fiend!)
To most, Thy mercies never reach,
Whose mercies never end.
Millions of souls Thy will Delighted to ordain Inevitable death to feel,
And everlasting pain."

"In vain Thy written Word
The hellish tale gainsays,
Which all receive their common Lord;
And offers all thy grace.
Prophets, apostles join,
And saints and angels call,
And Christ intends the Love divine
That sent him down for all.

"Yet still, alas! there are
Who give thee God the lie;
The Saviour of the world they dare
With all His truths deny.
A monstrous twofold will
To God, the Just, they give;
His Secret one ordained to kill,
Whom His declared hide live.

"The God of truth commands
All sinners to repent,
And mocks the work of His own hands
By what he never meant:
Commands them to believe
An unavailing lie,
Him for their Saviour to receive
For them who did not die."

"Loving to every man,
Of tenderness pity full,
Did God, the Good, the Just, ordain
To damn one helpless soul?
'He did! the Just! the Good,' (Hell answers from beneath) Spite of His Word, His Oath, He would
He will the sinner's death."

"Like as a father feels
His suffering children's care,
Is God each kind compassion dwells,
For all His offspring are:
'He loves His little ones'
(As Satan speaks) so well,
To dash their brains against the stones,
And shut them up in hell."

"He gives them damning grace
To raise their torments higher,
And makes his shrieking children pass
To Moloch through the fire;
He doomed their souls to death
From all eternity:
That is that wisdom from beneath,
That HORRIBLE DECREE!"

SUNDAY-SCHOOL CELEBRATION.
BY DR. NEELY'S CHURCH, MOBILE, ALA.

Mr. Editor:—I came into the city of Mobile on the 26th of April, and learning from the papers that a Sunday-School celebration was to take place in the St. Francis street Methodist Church that night, I decided to attend. As I feel deeply interested in the cause of Sunday-Schools and the instruction of the young, and as this was the grandest affair of the kind I ever witnessed, I ask a place in your excellent paper to give your readers a brief sketch of the whole proceedings.

At an early hour the Church was crowded, packed, jammed, and running over, so that hundreds went away, not being able to get a place to stand. I was fortunate enough, through the kindness of the pastor, to get a seat near the platform. The Church was decorated with great taste, and in the most beautiful manner, with evergreens and flowers, and with mottoes—all of which was suggestive of the smiles of Heaven upon her happy children.

But here comes the School—over two hundred—how will they get through those crowded aisles?—Well, they are seated at last in the pews reserved for them, and the exercises open with prayer by Dr. Hamilton, pastor of the Franklin street Methodist Church. The Salutation is now read by a young lady. We were greatly surprised to learn that it was her own composition. It was a master conception, elegantly developed, beautifully clothed and gracefully read; it was a wonderful production for one so young. Some may have thought the laudations towards the close, in which the pastor, superintendent, and teachers were highly complimented, were rather profuse; but from what we saw of the fruits of their labors, we think they were entitled to it all.—The next in order was a dialogue by a dozen or so of little children, in which it was shown that baptized children were members of the church, and consequently they should not think of having dancing at their little parties. The point was forcibly brought out, and will have a good effect, I think, upon that vast audience. Oh, when will the Church learn that the lamb is a part of the fold of Christ! In connection with, and as a part of, this dialogue, all the infant school came upon the platform. What a cluster of rose-buds! how sweetly they sang! This was the prettiest scene in the programme. Next came a dialogue on "obeying orders," the object of which was to show that the Bible forbids us keeping bad company. The arrangement of this dialogue was very fine, and the boys who spoke it acquitted themselves well: the moral effect must have been good—at least, we hope that all the boys and young men who heard it, will never forget the scripture that was adduced on this important subject. The next dialogue was full of points—some of them very sharp, too. The negligent, unfaithful teacher—that terrible drawback to nearly every Sunday-School—was handled without gloves. The subject of amusements for the young was handled admirably: dancing and theater-going were emphatically denounced, and a more excellent way pointed out, of which we will speak again. Then followed an address on sectarianism, and if there were any sectarian bigots there, I think they ought to have been ashamed of themselves.

Well, we have had an intermission of five minutes, during which all the young men and young ladies who compose the Bible classes of the school have gone upon the platform. What a group! There is the hope of the Church! They sang a beautiful song, which introduced the next dialogue, "Error Convinced," in which eight persons took part. As all these dialogues were written for the occasion, and were designed to correct the leading errors in the social and religious circle, in this dialogue Young America, latitudinarian religionists, and Sabbath breakers were all respectfully noticed. "The Prodigal's Return" was, by eminence, the dialogue of the evening, and was rendered by five young men and two young ladies, all members of the Bible classes, who acquitted themselves to the delight of all present. This dialogue was in two sections, depicting first the ruin of a noble youth by intemperance, and then his reformation through the agency of his former christian associates. It was so touchingly rendered that it spoke to the heart of every one present, while the unbidden tear stole down many a cheek.

The audience was then addressed by Mr. R. P. Baker, one of the teachers. The address evinced a good deal of thought, and was delivered with ease and dignity. It closed with an appropriate eulogy upon woman as a Sabbath worker, and, very appropriately, closed the exercises of the evening. The singing, which came between the dialogues and addresses, was very fine, and reflected much credit upon both Mr. Pease, the organist of the Church, and Miss Furlong, who has charge of the singing in the infant department of the school.

The present Superintendent, Wm. L. Baker, has labored with indefatigable energy in building up this school, and has given a great deal out of his own pocket to keep it supplied with books, &c. He is a son of Col. R. A. Baker, so well known, and so much beloved by all who know him. R. P. Baker is another son of that noble-hearted man; and we know it will be gratifying to his old coadjutors whom he has left behind, to know that the sons are following in their father's footsteps. The assistant superintendent, Dr. Neely, and all the teachers deserve great praise for the manner in which they have aided the pastor and superintendent in making this school what it is.—Through their combined efforts it has, in a short time, more than trebled its number of pupils, while this celebration is an era in the history of Sabbath-schools in this city. Dr. Neely is a dear lover of children, and a warm friend to Sunday-schools, never ceasing in his efforts for the moral culture of the one-and-the-other. He has never failed, we believe, to have a large Sunday-school at every Church of which he has been pastor.

We promised to refer again to the dialogue on amusements. We were gratified to hear the Doctor, (for he wrote the dialogue) utter such a protest against dancing and theater-going. On the other hand, we think that those who are so ultra in their notions of religious propriety that they would deprive the young of all amusements and social pleasures, were shown, in that dialogue, how they make their religion repulsive to the young, and thereby lose all influence over them. How many there are of this class, who hold up their hands in holy horror at every thing that looks like amusement, and when they find that their children will not submit to such "laac-jacket rules," they turn them over to the world and the devil—washing their hands in innocence—hoping and praying that God will some how bring them back when they have finished "sowing their wild oats." It seems to me there must be a happy-medium here. Shall we give up our children to the devil to work unrighteousness, because their nature requires some recreation? Or shall we not try to make them religious at all, because it is unnatural for them to be as sedate as hoary age? Sir, I think not. The success of Dr. Neely, in every charge to which he has been appointed, in building up the Sunday-school and bringing the young people into the Church, shows that he is right in this subject. He has social meetings at the Parsonage for the children, where he provides and directs their amusements; he has his annual celebrations and makes them imposing and interesting.—Here is his power over the young! It is true that this costs him a great deal of labor, and subjects him to a few criticisms, but the work goes on, and the children are kept from haunts of vice and from going to other churches "we wot of," and are saved to the church in which they were brought up. I hope to see the time when not only every pastor, but every christian parent, will feel it a duty—a christian duty—to provide and direct amusements for the young under their care; and will give up that mistaken theory, which has ruined thousands, that "unless you can make children as old people, you must turn them over to the giddy whirl of sinful pleasure."

A SPECTATOR.

A Plea for Open Churches.

The annexed plea, from one of our most gifted female authors, for an open Church, where those who have no real home, and no place or chance for retirement, may go, each day or any day, for a moment's rest or worship—is very suggestive. The first difficulty to be overcome is the want of free churches, our Protestant system giving to each place of religious worship the character of a private establishment, designed chiefly, if not solely, for the few who have contributed to build and embellish it, or who pay an annual rent for its privileges. There is ample food for reflection in this outcry of one who writes from a heart experience of what she utters.—Journal of Commerce.

NEW YORK, March 8, 1867.

EDITORS OF THE JOURNAL OF COMMERCE.—We are all apt to think and feel that our country, in most particulars, is better than any other. But we must admit that there are, in other lands, some points of excellence superior to some in ours. The habit of keeping open the churches, which is common in many countries, is, most certainly, far better than our habit of keeping them fast shut, at all times except when they are needed for public worship, or other meetings. This cannot be a right custom. It is not in accordance with the needs of the people. The Temple of God's "peculiar people" was never closed to them. Week-days as well as Sabbath days they continually resorted there, and although they did at last profane its holy court by brokers' offices, this would have been a poor argument, and one not regarded, for the closing of its gates against those who love to frequent it for better purposes. No wonder, that David, and Simeon, and Anna, and all devout Jews, so loved the "Courts of Zion," no wonder that they thought "a day in Thy courts is better than a thousand," they were the very children of the temple. It was as a mother, a consoling mother to them. Into it they could run as to a refuge when the world oppressed or distressed them; it was to them literally as well as spiritually "for a shadow, in the day-time from the heat; for a place of refuge, and for a covert from the storm and rain." Why are not our churches like the temple of the Jews, and like the cathedrals in other lands, left always open? Would it spoil the carpets? Then take them away. Would the pulpit furniture and the hymn books be stolen? Then chain the furniture to the floor, and lock up the books. Something ought to be done at once so that churches may be left always open. It would be comfort and balm to many a wounded spirit to hide away even for an hour, in some silent corner of the silent church, to meditate and pray—perhaps to weep. There are multitudes who have, and can have, at home, not a moment of seclusion, who yet long for it, as hungry men do for food. To all these the open church would be as a covert, a refuge, and they ought to have it. The poor and crowded together inhabitants of other countries may, at any time, flee to the sanctuary, to hide grief; to pour out sorrows and penitence away from the notice of man. They may rest there if weary; they may slumber there if faint—and this is well. Catholics are in this thing much more truly Christians than are Protestants. Thus their churches are more a home to their people. "God is a spirit, and they that worship him must worship him in spirit and truth" we know; but few indeed are the souls that need outward help to reach Him. Few are the persons who can easily and comfortably commune with Him without retirement. One may easily learn by the trial of it, what pleasant and comforting thoughts come to the weary soul in the silent church. Its cool, dim light soothes the feelings; its quiet is delicious as balm. And many, many are the religious souls who would be made stronger, better and happier by being allowed free access all the week to churches. It is all wrong and of wrong to keep them closed. What comfort do the poor, the wronged, the desolate of Catholic countries take in praying in the churches? Why should such as these be denied in our midst the same refreshment? One of the first things Christ would say, were he to come and walk through these towns and cities, would be, "Open your churches." Never will the writer forget the healing influence upon one torn and overborne spirit, of an hour spent all alone in a church, which, by some unusual chance, was left open. Ever since that day there has been in that mind, a desire for liberty often to repeat the sweet experience, and to see it placed within the reach of all.

May the time come soon when those who rule in the matter will think more of what would be for the good of the people, than of how to keep the inside of church buildings in trim and dustless order? Trustees, consult with Christ.

A BAPTIST BIBLE.

The Louisiana Baptist contains the following:

"It has been related of a certain school that the parents of the little boys had presented them nice Bibles. Some of these boys were the children of Methodist and some of Baptist parents. It so happened that they got to debating the baptismal question, as probably, they had heard their parents. One evening a bright little boy, on returning home from school, in the most artless manner went to his father with his Bible in his hand, and said:

"Child.—Pa, I don't like this Bible. I want you to take it back and give me a Methodist Bible. Won't you, pa?"

"Father.—Why, my son, this is a good Bible. There is no other kind."

"C.—No, pa, this is a Baptist Bible, and I don't want it. 'Cause I can't argue with the Baptist boys out of it—it is all on their side!"

"F.—Why, how Willie—what makes you think so?"

"C.—'Cause it tells how Christ was baptized in a river, and John baptized folks in a river, and in another place it tells about two men riding along in a carriage, and they got out, and both of 'em went down into the water, and one baptized the other. I know it's a Baptist Bible."

"F.—But, my son, you don't understand it yet—"

"C.—Yes, pa, I read it. And I don't say one word about sprinkling babies; so I want you to take it back" pa, and give me a Bible that tells all about how our Saviour was sprinkled, and how the 'postles sprinkled folks, and about sprinkling babies. Then I'll beat them Baptist boys in our debates."

A smart story—reminds us of another. Once a boy was offering a litter of puppies for sale. It was in the days when politics ran high. "What sort of dogs are they, whig or democrat?" said one who made as though he would buy. "Whig dogs," answered the little fellow, at a venture. "Ah, I don't want anything to do with them," the gentleman replied, and walked off. "Hold on, mister—see here: they are whigs now because they are blind; but soon their eyes will be opened, and then they'll be democrats."

When Willie and the other lads at that school get older and wiser, they will get over such things. Their maturer minds and information will enable them to understand the analogy of faith, to take in the nature and provisions of the Christian covenant, and to comprehend the privileges and universal principles of the Church of God. Then their views of the mode of baptism, and the relation of children to the Church, will not stand on such a narrow and rickety basis as the translation of a preposition from the original Greek into the English language. Their faith will not hang on a particle of speech, but will rest on broad, consistent, ancient, and immutable foundations.

One is ready to wonder at the sometimes immodest and overbearing confidence of those whose peculiar dogma, as to the mode and subjects of baptism, depends on a few catch-words and isolated passages. This may be excused in children. "When I was a child, I understood as a child, I thought as a child." But men, in understanding, ought to put away childish things.

And these catch-words, "into the water," etc., how equivocal! In over two hundred instances throughout the New Testament the original word here translated into is translated to. Suppose it had read that "the two men riding along in a carriage"—upon one of them being converted, and the place being desert, and baptism having to be hastily attended to without any preparations—went down to the water, and came up from the water. What then? We presume the parents of those Baptist boys, who argue so well for immersion, if they were traveling in a carriage or otherwise, and came to a creek, or mill or river, and had need of water, to drink or wash their hands and faces, would go down to the water; and when they had done, come up from the water. The immersion of their whole bodies is not a necessary or even a probable inference of such going down to and coming up from. And yet an exclusive creed is based, not on a preposition, but on an indifferent translation of a preposition!

Willie's father was sensible. His boy might be expected to outgrow such notions—if bigotry did not in the meantime prepossess him—just as he would outgrow the notion that the world was flat and did not turn over, because if it did all the water would spill out of the mill-pond.

Is it not significant, notwithstanding our story, that Methodists, Presbyterians, and other Pedobaptists, are satisfied with the Bible as it is? The Baptists are trying to get up a new version!

SCIENTIFIC.

From the Journal of Commerce.

The Wonders of Electricity—The Latest Triumph of Science.

The perfect success of the Atlantic Telegraph has eclipsed the splendor of an entirely new discovery in the mysterious science of electricity brought out by Mr. H. Wilde, of Liverpool, during the past year. It is like the finding of a new continent, the exploration of which is sure to be rewarded with vast and valuable accessions to the domain of human knowledge.

To describe Mr. Wilde's discovery without the aid of diagrams, so as to render it clear to persons unfamiliar with electrical apparatus and processes, would be impossible. In a general way, it may be said that the discoverer has found a method of producing electricity in quantities and of an intensity hitherto unknown, by the action of feeble electrical currents upon powerful magnets. Mr. Wilde performs his wonders by the combination of six small permanent magnets weighing only a pound each, a ten inch electro-magnetic machine, having an electro magnet weighing three tons (which accumulates and retains the developed electricity, on the same principle as an insulated submarine cable, or the Leyden jar,) and an armature revolving within an iron cylinder at the rate of fifteen hundred turns a minute. The cylinder is about a foot long, and has a bore of two and a half inches; the armature which plays within it, not touching the sides, is coiled about with this insulated copper wire. It is from this armature, when the different parts of the apparatus have been connected and put into operation, that the electricity is evolved and the effects are produced.

These effects are astonishing. An arch of electric light several inches long spans the space between the polar terminals of fixed carbon. This light rivals the sun in its dazzling luminousness. At a distance of a quarter of a mile it throws shadows from the flames of street lamps upon a wall. In twenty seconds it darkens sensitized paper held at a distance of two feet from the light, as effectually as one minute of full noonday sunshine. This fact, when first announced to the scientific world, was received with incredulity, but it is the truth. Two enterprising photographers in England have since put up the machines in their shops, and now do all their copying and enlarging by the new electric light at night. Of course the heating power of the flame is intense. It melts seven feet of No. 16 iron wire, and heats to a red heat twenty-one feet of the same wire in an instant.

Now here, assuredly, is a great discovery. What is the full scope of the possibilities opened by it, no one can tell, nor intelligently conjecture. The cost of the apparatus is small, the waste of materials trifling, and where the motive power for driving the armatures is already at hand, the expense of working would be nominal. The operation is continuous and reliable, and the only objection brought against the machine is the noise caused by the revolving armatures which could be obviated. A complete machine made under the direction of the inventor, will soon be brought to this city and exhibited. The utilization of its extraordinary powers, which first presents itself to the mind of most persons, is, probably, the lighting of Broadway. A light which would enable people to read more than a quarter of a mile away would leave nothing to be desired. Twelve such lights would perfectly illuminate Broadway from the Battery to Fourteenth street, at an expense, after the apparatus was purchased, far below that of the present gas lights. For lighthouses it would be just the thing, and for churches and all other places of public resort. It would be indeed rash to say that some method could not be devised to introduce it generally in our houses and stores.

This discovery, where it can be applied, promises to perform the miracle of changing night into day. Perhaps, too, the intense heat generated may be capable of turning winter into summer. Scientific men have long looked to electricity as the agent that is, in the progress of human knowledge, to develop the darkest mysteries of nature, and to become the instrumentality by which man may work out results now thought to be possible only to Omnipotence.

We add a paragraph from the Tribune:

The occasional working of the Atlantic cables—both being thrown into one circuit of nearly 5,000 miles—by the infinitesimally small battery in a lady's thimble has so utterly revolutionized the notions of electricians and telegraphers concerning the power required for working that vast telegraphic circuit, that intelligent people are now scarcely surprised at the latest assertions concerning the illimitable resources for generating Electric Light cheaply, and the quality of that light compared with solar light.

NEW MODE OF GLASS ENGRAVING.

We are indebted to Judge Paschal of this city (late of Texas), for specimens of window glass engraved by a process patented by C. O. Strenme, of Austin. The process consists in forming the design upon ground glass with glue or other strongly adhesive and contractile paste, which in contracting detaches laminae of irregular shape and thickness from the surface of the glass, and leaves the design wrought in a style of peculiar beauty, resembling hard frostwork. The design in glue may be formed by means of a stencil plate, and the work thus executed as rapidly as the brands on packing boxes, etc. Or if the design be too complex to be stencilled in a satisfactory manner, the drawing or print to be copied may be laid under the glass and traced in fac simile with a lead pencil, after which the lights within and around the design may be covered with a protecting varnish and the glue then applied to the shades, giving the picture in frostwork; or the shades may be protected and the lights may be etched, leaving the picture in ground glass, set in frostwork. It will be seen that the requisite apparatus and skill are within the reach of every one. Glassware may thus be very cheaply marked with the name or cipher of the owner, as readily as linen.

HOW TO SEND MONEY.

We are frequently receiving enquiries upon this point. We have lost scarcely anything by the mails, and consider them safe. The risk at any rate will be ours.

TO AGENTS.

Our agents will please, whenever practicable, forward money by draft on Mobile, or New Orleans, payable to our order. We have reason to believe that of all the monies forwarded to us by mail but a very small amount has failed to reach us: whenever the letters have been registered.

TO SUBSCRIBERS.

Any person wishing to subscribe for this paper can do so, by paying the Methodist preacher in the circuit, and forwarding to us his receipt for three dollars, with the address of the subscriber upon it, stating Post office, State, Circuit, and Conference. The receipt ought to be taken in duplicate.

TO ADVERTISERS.

This paper has for many years been well known in this community as the very best advertising medium by which the business men of the city could bring their merchandise, trades, professions, and the like, before country readers. This is easily understood when it is remembered that the four hundred preachers who are scattered throughout these States in the Rio Grand, East Texas, Louisiana, Mississippi, Montgomery and Alabama Methodist Conferences, are all, more or less active agents for the paper; and when it is also remembered that our paper circulates among a large class of people who seldom see any other New Orleans paper.

THE DEFICIENCY.

We publish elsewhere an appeal in behalf of the Bishops. The list of the deficiencies in their salaries is published in the "Nashville Christian Advocate." The Louisiana Conference was minus the amount for their support assessed to it in the sum of $158, the Mississippi $555, and the Mobile $346. This amount can be made up on the first Sabbath in June by every male member of the church handing the preacher in charge one DOLLAR. These men of God who have long labored for the church, and are doubly consecrated to its service, have a claim upon our people that we are persuaded will be acknowledged and promptly met. Preachers will please forward these collections to us by mail and we will remit it to the Book Agent at Nashville. "The hardness of the times" have nothing specially to do with this matter, for the Lord is forward as the same; yesterday, to-day, and forever.

THE WOLF.

For the first time in the history of this country large numbers of people are threatened with famine. During the war there was much scarcity of food and privation at certain points, where troops were massed for any considerable time, or in the track of a raid; but there was no absolute wide-spread want of bread. The year directly after the war, the South realized a good deal from the cotton which had accumulated in the hands of planters who lived out of the range of the armies. This was consumed in purchasing necessary clothing, and farming implements. The general failure of the corn crop last year, and the partial failure in the cotton—in some cases the total—left the farmer entirely dependent upon the merchant for food. Supplies for two years, the last and this, have been already advanced upon the faith of a crop yet to be gathered, or it may be, planted. In many sections of this and the neighboring States, bordering on the Mississippi, great and sudden floods have destroyed these supplies. Merchants strained to a tension only a little short of snapping are no longer able to afford relief. They have no more credit or money to bring to the aid of the planter. It is in this terrible condition that thousands in the Southwest await the approach of "the wolf."

A good deal of stir and talk in New York and New England indicate at least that this stern state of affairs is understood by them; and here and there some Cooper-Institute demonstration has been made; but they are not generally prepared to aid people with whom they have been so recently at war. They do not find it "more blessed to give than to receive."

The "international" advocates of peace-extra are just beginning to supply their proportion of bitterness. From '60 to '64 they were in favor of "peaceful justice," holding themselves in reserve. Now they indulge in unrelenting spite, and seem to have discovered, with Frederick the great, that "revenge is a repast fit for the gods." This is that Faneuil Hall wing, the platform portion of the East, which usually leads off in May Anniversaries, in great Charities, in distant Missions, and advocates a "mutual, universal disarmament." It has at last found a charity big enough to choke the "most magnanimous people in the world"—that of giving food to a famished vanquished foe. They do give a little but with no enthusiasm, and not much "cheerfulness;" and of that little, we have yet to hear of the reception of the first dollar.

Through the noble exertions of the friends of the M. E. Church, South, in California, several thousand dollars have been raised for the relief of our starving people, and have been actually received for distribution by Bishop McTyeire. We are mainly indebted, therefore to Rev. O. P. Fitzgerald, of the "Spectator" of San Francisco. In this hour of need, that which is quickly done will be twice done. So we are glad to notice that throughout Kentucky and Missouri, open-hearted citizens forgetting their own overwhelming troubles, are sending liberal supplies of corn and meat to the famishing South. When the clouds disappear, and the sun shines again we shall not forget those who have remembered us in the day of our calamity. In this labor of love the "St. Louis Christian Advocate" has worked without stint and has accomplished much. The "Free Commonwealth" of Louisville, Ky., has also devoted its able columns to this cause of humanity.

The State of Louisiana has probably lost more from the war than any other Southern State, because it had more to lose. The destruction of the levee system and the labor system, has nearly destroyed the sugar region of the Mississippi and its bayous, and the immense cotton regions of the Red river, the Washita, and the Atchafalaya. These great and fertile valleys will be surrendered to wandering freedmen, and annual floods, and will be of small agricultural value for many years to come. Thousands of people who have hitherto lived in them, are now living on platforms and rafts, waiting for the disappearance of the waters, and the appearance of grim famine, a monster even fiercer than the Plymouth wolf.

The following extract from an editorial of the Northern Christian Advocate is in point, and forcibly suggests the Scripture:—"If thine enemy hunger, feed him."

SOUTHERN RELIEF.—The papers interested in this subject, express their surprise, that so feeble a response is made to the call to help Southern rebels. The Tribune says: "We are amazed at the apathy with which the appeals hitherto made for our starving countrymen have been met. As yet, apart from what our noble women have raised, only $35,000 have been contributed. Ten years ago, a like appeal would have been responded to at the rate of hundreds of thousands per day. Are these people less near to us because of their need?"

"Let us resolve that at least $100,000 shall be contributed this week by our City. Let us not be shamed by St. Louis, which has given $125,000. James M. Brown is the Treasurer."

We confess we are not surprised. The events of "ten years" furnish a sufficient explanation of the existing "apathy" of the North towards the South. The past "ten years" have furnished a record of wrong, and insult, and crime, and barbarity, and murder, by the South, against the North, such as has never been written before in either civilized or savage life. After such a record, the mere outside show of peace and brotherhood, will not effect peace, nor create a brotherly feeling. The community at the North has been too deeply injured, they have been too frequently deceived by the perfidy and perjury of the South, they have too strong evidence at the present time, of their hate and ready willingness to perpetrate again the same barbarous outrages, as opportunity serves, to call forth the sympathy and gifts of those thus wronged. It may seem harsh to say these things, nevertheless they are the true feelings of ten thousands of generous human hearts. Neither humanity, nor Christianity, requires that we feed and support the assassin of our first-born, while at liberty, and who boldly justifies his murderous act, and is ready to lie in wait to repeat the slaughter on the only son left us. We are to do good to our enemy, but we are not to feed and clothe him while lying in ambush to burn down our dwelling, yea, while he is continuing to rob, maltreat, and murder our friends. That this is the attitude which the South maintains towards the North is evidenced by repeated acts since peace was proclaimed, and by every investigation of their riotous conduct, in Memphis, and New Orleans, and the drunken ovation given to the released murderers of the United States soldiers in South Carolina, the boasted disappearance of Union men from Texas, and the protection and plaudits given to the murderers of Union men everywhere in the South, and the universal testimony of such men as Generals Thomas, Sheridan and Sickles that the pretended civil authorities in the Southern States furnish no shield to Union men, and execute no penalties upon their murderers. Now, until this is changed, calls for help will be but faintly responded to.

When you read these lines, think of our missionaries, who have toiled half the Conference year, and have not yet, many of them, received one cent. Think of these brethren, who will work hard on circuits all the year, and not get money enough, to pay their traveling expenses to Marion. Brethren, one and all, think of these things, and if you have not already commenced, begin at once, your missionary collections.

REV. ROBERT R. R. ALEXANDER. The sad intelligence reached us last week of the death of Rev. Robt. R. R. Alexander, a member of the Louisiana Conference. He has filled some of the most important stations in the Conference. He died at Jefferson, Texas, in the triumphs of Christian faith. We are expecting a suitable notice of this true minister of Christ, by those who are conversant with the particulars of his death.

STRONG FRIENDS.

"You see that the Advocate has some very strong friends here, or they would not take a horse out of the plough and ride thirty miles a week for the privilege of reading it."—Extract from an Alabama Agent's letter.

That is very strong partiality—those thirty-mile rides to the Post office we can appreciate: We could ask no stronger evidence. The ride there; the ride back; the loss of one day's ploughing; loss of one day's labor; and the probable gait of the plough-horse are all items of a very decided character.

RACHEL NOBLE'S EXPERIENCE.

By BRUCE EDWARD. New York, National Temperance Society, 172-William St. 1867—16mp.

We have read this little book with unmixed pleasure. It is a Scottish prize Essay, one selected from eighty manuscripts. The style is refreshingly piquant, the cast of the story ingenious and happy, the characters well sustained, and the moral deeply impressive. Everything that battles with the monstrous vice of intemperance we welcome to our library, and wish it God-speed in its mission.

MISSIONARY.

TO THE PREACHERS OF THE MOBILE CONFERENCE.

You will remember, that at our last session, we adopted a new plan, for raising money for our domestic missions. That plan, if faithfully carried out by us, will gladden the hearts, not only of our missionaries, but of many of our brethren, who receive little or nothing, on their circuits. It will enable us to send the gospel, into destitute regions. It provides for doing much; yet it will utterly fail, unless we are all industrious. It imposes a good deal of labor on us and requires us to work by method; but as preachers, labor with us, should be rest; or as Methodist preachers, we should work by method.

When you read these lines, think of our missionaries, who have toiled half the Conference year, and have not yet, many of them, received one cent. Think of these brethren, who will work hard on circuits all the year, and not get money enough, to pay their traveling expenses to Marion. Brethren, one and all, think of these things, and if you have not already commenced, begin at once, your missionary collections.

The "plan" requires us, to get a suitable blank book, and then see each member in our charges, and put in that book, the amount he will give to our domestic missions. The plan required us to do this, early in the conference year; and the amounts subscribed, were to be paid quarterly, and forwarded to Henry Stollenwerk our Treasurer, at Selma Ala. Any P. E. holding drafts, can take them up, out of the funds, collected in his district, and there forward them, receipted, to the Treasurer, reserving one tenth, for the present board, at Nashville. Now brethren, let us all go to work. Let us visit our entire membership. Pass none by. See to it, that every man, woman, and child, gives something. Make application also, to those who attend upon our ministry, but who are not members of the church. It is by faithfulness in little things, that great aggregates are produced. If we will all do our duty, this plan will fill the hearts of our brethren, who work hard, and get but a meagre support, with gladness, when they meet us at conference. Don't put the matter off a single day, but go to work at once.

As brother Abernethy, was disappointed, in his attempts to publish the Minutes of our Conference, I hope he will furnish the Constitution of our missionary board, to the New Orleans Advocate, for publication.

PHIL. E. NEELY,
Pres. of Board.
Mobile, Ala., May 7th, 1867.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

A letter from the Rev. J. J. Grace, of the Eastern Shore Circuit, says: "I have received twelve members recently." At a Quarterly Conference recently held, three churches were organized. We are glad to hear from the same source that Dr. Dorman's health is much improved.

Mr. Editor:

We have a most triumphant revival—not so much for the number converted or added to the church—but greater displays of the power of the cross to overcome the evil spirits and principles of men, in mind and conduct, you never saw. A wonderful change has taken place here. (Go ask Dr. Lyons something about it, and you will get items over which you will rejoice) Rev. A. E. Goodwyn and Rev. Jno. Wilkinson have done good work, and God blessed them, they were messengers of great good to us.

Fraternally yours,
F. T. LAWSON.

Plaquemine Brulee, La. Apl. 23. '67.

SUPPORT OF THE BISHOPS.—The last General Conference in providing for the support of our Bishops devised an entirely new plan. Before the war, the Publishing House and Missionary Society paid a considerable part of their support. This can be no longer done. Their claims were computed by the Conference, and divided out among the Conferences, with a request that they should make proper arrangements for meeting these claims. In some of the Conferences only five or six months elapsed between this action and their next sessions. In these, the assigned sums were not collected, at the usual time of aggregating the collections of the Church. In others the claim was paid in full, and the amount handed over to the Bishop presiding.

At the late meeting of the Bishops it was ascertained that the total collection was deficient fully 20 per cent. of the sum allowed them; and that some of them who had attended Conferences paying in full had received enough to meet their proportion, while others—the majority—had received but little.

By the law of the Church, they are to divide pro rata, and those who supposed themselves paid, and believed all would be, find now that they will probably have to pay part of their legitimate salary to their colleagues. They do not complain of this; but the Church has a duty to perform, that this necessity may not be laid on them.

By the law, the year for which these claims are adjusted ends 1st June. It is to be hoped, that by that time, collections will be taken up in the deficient Conferences and forwarded to the Book Agent, so that out of them the deficiency can be paid. Now, we promise to urge upon the Church an appeal make by a meeting called to consider this deficiency and the best method of meeting it. It was deemed discreditable that the claims of these servants of the Church should be neglected—and it was proposed to make an effort in every quarter to bring up a sum sufficient by 1st June to make a pro rata division among them unnecessary.

If, therefore, there are any who paid nothing last year to the Bishops' fund, or who can pay more than they paid, and are willing to give any aid—however small—to this good work, if they will forward their contributions to us, we will see it take the proper direction. Let what is done, be done at once. Will not the preachers help? bearing in mind that this is not the collection ordered for the present year. It seems hardly worth our while to add an exhortation. If the bare statement of the facts in the case, not a sufficient appeal to the Methodist who values the labor of our Bishops, and who holds them in honor, to make a little sacrifice in their behalf, we do not think could reach his pocket by the urgent appeal.—Southern Christian Advocate.

SOUTHERN RELIEF.—It affords unspeakable satisfaction to the reception of an order for $50 in gold, from the Rev. O. P. Fitzgerald, San Francisco, California for the relief of the suffering in South. This draft was sold $4,104 66, in currency—which this time is making many a widow heart glad, and drying up many orphan's tear. Bishop McTyeire discharged the pleasant task of distribution; and we can see our benevolent friends on the coast that every cent of their contributions will be applied to meet their wishes. Bishop has received satisfactory letters from all the recipients of past favors; and we are sure the gratitude expressed by them would yield more pleasure to the benefactors than minkworms realize in gloating over their hoarded treasures.—Nashville Chr. Adv.

Case of Mr. Davis.

RICHMOND, May 8.—U. S. Marshall Underwood to-day received the following writ and leaves for Mr. Davis to-morrow: "The President of the United States to: Brig. Gen. Henry S. Burton, and to any having the custody of Jefferson Davis, greeting: We command that you have the body of Jefferson Davis, by you, imprisoned and detained, as it is said, together with the cause of such imprisonment, detention, by whatsoever the said Jefferson Davis may be called as charged, before our Court of the United States of District of Virginia, at the next thereof, at Richmond, in said district, on the second Monday in 1867, at the opening of the court that day, to be and receive shall then and there be considered concerning the said Jefferson Davis. Witness: Salmon P. Chase, Chief Justice of the Supreme of the United States, this 1st May, 1867; W. H. Barry, Clerk of the Circuit of the United District of Virginia."

Mr. Davis when he arrived Sunday, will still be in military custody, and will not be produced in court till Monday. It is stated that he will be in Libby prison, where apart will be assigned to him.

THE CITY CAR DIFFICULTIES.—was a good deal of excitement the lower part of the city, particularly on Rampart street, on Sunday, caused by what seemed to be a preconceived design on the part of a number of colored men to themselves into the rail cars signed to white people.

The public mind, though the city, was in a very feverish condition during the day, apprehending having possessed people that riotous, perhaps calamitous, disturbance might come upon the city as a result of the continued action of this car question. Mayor visited Rampart street in the noon, and, addressing the assembled there, induced the dispersal, and since then everything has been quiet.

The question will come up specially on Wednesday before Judge Gastinel. The case is in which a colored man was charged of assault and battery against a driver and a state putting him forcibly out of the car for whites.

The issue is direct, and the decision is finally rendered, for the term the question, for the involved in the present case, whether the railroad companies' agents have lawful authority to enforce the regulations of the classification of cars.

CLASSIFICATION OF CARS.—generally reported yesterday the presidents of the various railroad companies had a meeting to determine what was to be in relation to the classification of cars. Subjoined is an order of subject, issued by the chief of which will be read as one of the most suggestive and significant documents that has ever been in this community:

"OFFICE CHIEF OF POLICE
New Orleans, May 8, 1867.
"Lieut. Ramey, Second District:
"Have no interference with grocery riding in cars of any class. No passenger has a right to eject other passenger, no matter what color. If he does so, he is liable for arrest for assault, or breach of peace."

Thos. E. Anderson,
"Chief of Police."

MARRIED.

Married, at the residence of the bride in Richland, Holmes county, Miss., on the 10th inst., by Rev. Dr. Ward, Mr. E. L. M. and Mrs. Eliza H. F. Bird.

BRITISH HONDURAS.

It will be seen that the laws are administered with promptness and efficiency in the Colonial Government of Honduras. The following report of trials before the Supreme Court of the Colony, during the March Term, we copy from the Belize Advertiser:

MONDAY, 25th March, 1867.

The Supreme Court of judicature commenced its March sittings for 1867 this day before His Honor Richard James Corner, Esq., Chief Justice.

Shortly after the opening of the Court the Queen's proclamation against vice and immorality was read, and the customary formalities gone through and disposed of.

Some jurors made application to exempt them on the ground of being on actual military service, the Chief Justice referred it to the Attorney General, who informed him that there was a clause in the Volunteer Act, exempting the Volunteers from serving on Inquests only.

The criminal calendar was a serious one, as will appear by the number of prisoners informed against, and the nature of the offences with which they were respectively charged.

The prisoners were arraigned and placed as follows:—

1. Regina against Marcos Canul and Damacio Castillo, for murder. Plea Damacio Castillo who alone was arraigned—Not Guilty. Mr. Bristowe was assigned by the Court as Counsel for the prisoner.

2. Regina against Marcos Canul and Damacio Castillo for house breaking and larceny. Plea of Damacio Castillo—Not Guilty.

3. Regina against same parties for assault and robbery. Plea of Damacio Castillo—Not Guilty.

4. Regina against Urgencio Moreno, alias Prudencio Moreno, for larceny. Plea not guilty.

5. Regina against Jose Narciso Poot and Ek Feliciano, for murder. Plea of the prisoner Poot, not guilty.

Mr. Bristowe was named by the Court as Counsel for the prisoner Narciso Jose Poot, but on the suggestion of that learned gentleman, the defence was assigned to Mr. Aikman.

6. Regina against same parties for feloniously wounding. Plea of the prisoner Poot—Not Guilty.

7. Regina against Daniel Thomas for cutting and wounding. Plea not guilty.

8. Regina against Jose Domingo Mozier, for rape. Plea not guilty.

9. Regina against Christina Polanco, for larceny. Plea not guilty.

10. Regina against same for setting fire to a dwelling house. Plea not guilty.

11. Regina against Juan Santos, for manslaughter. Plea not guilty.

12. Regina against Jose Gregorio Tacu, for manslaughter. Plea not guilty.

13. Regina against Jose Maria Mendez and Jose Jenz Mendez, for murder of William Thomas Severn. Plea not guilty.

14. Regina against same parties, for murder of John Winter. Plea not guilty.

Mr. Hempstead informed the Court he was retained by Mr. Martinez on behalf of one of the prisoners, and that he was willing to appear for both prisoners.

15. Regina against same parties for treasonable felony. Plea not guilty.

16. Regina against Thomas Daniel for stabbing and wounding. Plea not guilty.

On the arraignment of the prisoners being concluded the Attorney General said that he should call on the undefended case, or such as were ready first and then go on with the defended cases. His Honor said he should not bring on the case against Damacio Castillo before Thursday, and the one against Jose Narciso Poot before Wednesday.

A jury was then sworn and Thomas Daniel was tried for cutting and wounding—Several witnesses were examined for the Crown—the prisoner had no witnesses to the case.

The Chief Justice summed up in his usual clear and lucid manner—the jury without retiring returned a verdict of guilty when His Honor at once sentenced the prisoner to 9 months in Gaol, with hard labor.

The Court then adjourned until the following morning, at 10 o'clock.

TUESDAY, March 26th.

The Court met at 10 o'clock. A jury being sworn—Christina Polanco was put in the dock and the plea of not guilty having been taken on the charges of larceny and setting fire to a dwelling house, her trial proceeded with.

The prisoner was defended by Mr. Hempstead.

The case lasted the whole day, the defence set up was an "Alibi," and had the jury believed the witnesses who "appeared" for the defence and swore positively that the prisoner was at another place when the fire and larceny took place,

she must have been acquitted, but the community at large has to thank an intelligent jury and a pains-taking judge, that a woman, the associate of prostitutes, and brothel-keepers is not again thrown among them without suffering the penalty of her crimes.

The learned Judge sentenced the prisoner to one year's imprisonment with hard labor the first and last 14 days of the time, in solitary confinement, for the larceny, and to two years imprisonment with hard labor, concurrent with the first sentence, for arson.

The Court then adjourned until 10 o'clock the following morning.

WEDNESDAY, March 27th.

The Court met at 10 o'clock. A jury being duly sworn, Urgencio Moreno alias Prudencio Moreno, having been previously arraigned and pleaded not guilty, was put upon his trial and acquitted.

Jose Domingo Mozier was then put upon his trial for a felonious assault upon a child under 12 years of age, and being convicted, was sentenced to 12 months imprisonment with hard labor.

The Court adjourned until 10 o'clock the following day.

LATEST NEWS.

LONDON, May 2.—In the conference of European Governments for the settlement of the Luxembourg question, it is reported the leaders hesitate guaranteeing the neutrality of Luxembourg. The people of the grand duchy desire annexation to Bavaria.

Two r. n.—The Conference, adjourned until to-morrow.

Reports from Warsaw state that the Russian Government is concentrating troops and accumulating munitions of war in the province of Poland.

DENOUEMENT.—MEXICAN.—We have startling and important news from Mexico, through private sources, which we regard as reliable.

Another battle has occurred near the beleaguered city of Queretaro, the final result of which was the defeat and complete disorganization of the Imperial forces, and killing of its leader, the Mexican Gen. Miramon.

After the fight, the city of Queretaro was at once occupied by the Liberals, and a vigilant search made for the person of Maximilian I, but without discovering that empireless Emperor. Max. is doubtless, by a secret flight, endeavoring to reach the protection of the American flag.

Our information does not lead us to believe that the Liberals massacred any of the Imperial military officers who fell into their hands at Queretaro; nor do we regard it as probable that Maximilian will be treated otherwise than as an ordinary prisoner of war, should he have the misfortune to be captured.

The report heretofore published in the Times, that the Imperial forces under Marquez, who fortified himself at a hacienda near Puebla, had been routed by the troops of Porfirio Diaz, is confirmed by our later intelligence. The Liberals are therefore complete masters of the situation, there being little if any organized resistance to the Republican Government remaining.—N. O. Times.

MADAGASCAR.—There are eighteen thousand professing Christians in Madagascar, and the Queen, by a treaty with England, has granted full religious liberty to all her subjects. There are seventy-nine churches under the care of seven English missionaries, ninety live native pastors and teachers.

AUSTRIA.—The Congregationalists have seventeen or eighteen ministers and churches in New South Wales more than half of which are in Sydney and the suburbs, while the interior is comparatively neglected. In Victoria and Adelaide they have a greater number of churches, more equally distributed.

SWITZERLAND.—The Basle Missionary Society has purchased a schooner named the Palm, to run as a missionary ship between Europe and Africa. In her first voyage she took out one missionary, three young ladies as teachers, and 24,000 bricks and an entire house for the station and Christian barge.

The Pope of Rome has recently canonized 205 Japanese martyrs who were put to death between 1617 and 1632!

LIFE UNDER CHRIST.—Goodness has now become ten times more powerful in becoming an enthusiasm. It no longer contents itself with barely preserving its existence in the presence of prevailing vice. It turns against its enemy, it undertakes to take the hostile army prisoners. The children of Israel turn and pursue the Egyptians through the Red Sea. Under the command of Christ, Jerusalem lays siege to Babylon.

RITUALISM.—We have no longer any right to speak of our national Protestant church; it is not Protestant; it tolerates barefaced Popery, and swarms with worshippers of the God whom the baker bakes in the oven, and whom they bite with their teeth. Not many streets from the house in which we are assembled, you may have your candles, and your incense, and your copes, and your altars, with all the other pomps and vanities of the detestable idolatry of Rome. That Romanism against which Latimer bore testimony at the stake has been suffered to hold its nummeries, and practice its fantastic tricks, in the name of this nation, until it counts its deluded admirers by tens of thousands. That monster, which stained Smithfield with gore, and made it an ash-heap for the martyrs of God, has come back to you. The old wolf that rent our fathers, and tore their palpitating hearts out of their bosoms, you have suffered to come back into your house, and you are cherishing it, and feeding it with your children's meat. Once again, the harlot of Babylon flaunts her finery in our faces almost without rebuke. Do not tell me it is not Popery; it is the self same Anti-christ with which your fathers wrestled—and a man with but half his wits about him may see it to be so; and yet this land bears it, and rejoices in it, and crouches at the feet of a priest once more. Our great ones, our delicate women, and dainty lords, are once again the willing vassals of priestcraft and superstition; and amid all this, if any one speaks out, he is assailed as uncharitable, and abhorred as a troublemaker in Israel. Is it for nothing that God has favored this land with the Gospel? Must all the gains of the valiant men of old be lost by the sloth and cowardice of this thoughtless generation? In days of yore, men like Knox and Welsh in Scotland, and Hugh Latimer and John Bradford, fought like lions for the truth; and are we to yield like coward curs? Are the men of oak succeeded by the men of willow? The men who cried, "No Popery here!" now sleep within their sepulchres, and their descendants wear the yoke which their fathers scorned. Shall not God visit us for this? I would that a voice of thunder could arouse this slumbering generation!—Spurgeon.

WHO MADE ALL THAT.—It is related that when Napoleon Bonaparte was returning to France from the expedition to Egypt, a group of French officers one evening entered into a discussion concerning the existence of a God. They were on the deck of the vessel that bore them over the Mediterranean Sea. Thoroughly imbued with the infidel and atheistical spirit of the times, they were unanimous in their denial of this truth. It was at length proposed to ask the opinion of Napoleon on the subject, who was standing alone, wrapped in silent thought. On hearing the question, Is there a God? he raised his hand, and pointing to the starry firmament, simply responded, "Gentlemen, who made all that?"

To be free from desire is money; to be free from the rage of perpetually baying something new is a certain revenue; to be content with what we possess constitutes the greatest and most certain of riches.—Cicero.

THE CANKER WORM.—Tar the trees to prevent the female grub from ascending the tree, which it does in the night time in the Spring, to deposit her eggs. This experiment was successfully tried in the forest of the present century in New England (Worcester County, Mass.), where this worm had proved very destructive. Care should be taken that the tar is not put upon the bark of the tree. Tar on young trees, to protect them from the mice, will keep off the mice but kill the trees! The New-Englanders used birch bark or a strip of canvass, say tree inches wide, put tight round the three, using a little clay and mud under the lower edge to prevent the grub from passing. It was said that in some instances they would stick in the tar in such quantities as to bridge it over in a single night, and some go up the tree. Those who were thorough in their work, saved their orchards.

SUNDAY-SCHOOL COLLECTING CARDS.—An abundant supply of the Sunday-School Collecting Card designed by Rev. W. E. M. Linfield and so successfully used in Natchez, and other places, in collecting funds for Sunday-School purposes, is on sale at the Branch Southern M. E. Publishing House, 112 Camp Street, in this city, with instructions for using them printed on the back of each. Sold in packs of 100, at $1 per pack. Sent by mail at $1.25 per pack. Address Robt J. HARP, Agent.

TENTHARY COLLEGE,
Jackson, Louisiana,
established by the State of Louisiana in 1845, and transferred to the Methodist Episcopal Church South in 1845. It is now under the management of the Mississippi and Louisiana Conferences.

Large exercises were necessarily suspended during the war; but were regularly resumed after reorganization, on the first of October, 1865. The approaching session will open on the first Monday of October.

For $75 per annum, payable semi-annually, a student can obtain a full course of instruction in the College, from $20 to $25 per year.

Buildings, Libraries, Apparatus, Laboratory, and all the modern conveniences, are provided, and the location in point of health, safety, and good society, is unparalleled by those of any institution in the South.

For a full history of the College, the pledge

RANDOLPH MACON COLLEGE, VA.,
IN FULL OPERATION.
THIS TIME HONORABLE INSTITUTION IS
once more in successful operation, with a FULL CORPS OF PROFESSORS. The chairs of the several schools are filled by able and experienced men. There are five literary and scientific
schools, viz: OF ANCIENT LANGUAGES,
CHEMISTRY AND NATURAL PHILOSOPHY,
MORAL PHILOSOPHY AND MODERN LAN-GUAGES. In addition to the above the Board of Trustees has established a school of COM-MERICAL SCIENCE, with the view of giving education to the country a BUSINESS

EDUCATION.
To graduates in these schools, Diplomas
are granted and the degrees of Bachelor of Arts
and Master of Arts are conferred upon students
who accomplish a certain course. The high grade of scholarship formerly required is still maintained. We have a full CHEMICAL, and PHILOSOPHICAL APPARATUS for the illustration of the subjects taught.

The location of the College is unsurpassed for health and geniality. It is situated midway between the mountains and the seaboard; and
during a career of thirty years, and with
thousands of young men in attendance, there
has never been a death arising from malaria or other local cause. We profess to educate young men not merely mentally but physically also.

NO. 16 SIXTEEN DOLLARS PER MONTH. Tuition from $40 to $50, according to the number of schools attended. $250 will cover expenses of board, tickets for three schools,
matriculation and contingent fees for ten months.
Rooms in the college free of charge, but the student provides his own furniture, fuel and
lights. Young men who are preparing for the ministry and who are desirous of the late year who
are unable to pay their tuition, will be allowed
to attend any or all of the schools free of charge.

This College is situated near Boydton, the
county seat of Mecklenburg county, Va.
Arrangements are made to transport students
from Railroad Depot, on the Raleigh and Weldon Railroad, which a conveyance leaves Ronoke station, on the Richmond and Danville
Railroad, on Mondays, Wednesdays and Fridays,
Tuesday, Thursdays and Saturdays.

We solicit a liberal patronage from Maryland,
Virginia and North Carolina, from the West,
South and South West.
Students will be received at any time. The second term will commence on the 6th day of February next. Young men will be received and prepared for the College proper. For further particulars address the undersigned at Boydton,
Mecklenburg county, Va.

Is one of the most necessary and desirable articles of household economy, and if properly managed, will promote the health, comfort, and happiness of every member of the family.
Time, money, and extreme vexation, by delay
of your daily meals, may be saved by using the CHARTER OAK COOKING STOVE.

Over 10,000 of these celebrated cooking stoves are in daily use throughout the city of New Orleans. Every one of them has been sold under a full guarantee, and we offer them as a reference wherever found.

The Improved Charter Oak Stove with Extension Top
has but one danger, and is so simple in its construction that a child can manage it. The covers are larger, bake more uniform, and the stove heavier than any cooking stove of corresponding size ever made.

The Hot Water Reservoir Boiler furnishes a constant supply of hot water at all hours of the day, and for hours after the fire has been extinguished, without additional cost for fuel, a practical illustration of the economy in using the Charter Oak.

The Reflector Griddle, original with the Charter Oak, and used on no other stove—the most perfect manner to broil meats and poultry,
whereby the offensive odors arising from meat,
during the process of broiling are carried up the pipe, and juices of the meats preserved.

The Hot Closet, in which meats and poultry are kept warm for hours when there has been a delay in meals, besides enabling the cook to furnish the greatest variety of dishes and desserts,
and place them hot upon the table.
The Charter Oak Stove will do one-third more baking in a given time, and use 25 per cent. less wood than any stove now made.

NEW ORLEANS MARKETS.

From the N. O. Price Current.

The limited movement in the general market, noticed in our last issue, was followed on Saturday and Monday by renewed animation in nearly every branch of trade, and an upward tendency of prices in several prominent articles, but Tuesday the demand subsided and business resumed its previous dullness. Our leading staple has been in good request at previous prices; the sales of Tobacco have been to a fair extent, in proportion to the amount offering; and Flour, Corn, Oats, and Bran have commanded advanced figures, while Pork has retained at prices more in favor of sellers, and Provisions generally have been steady at last week's currency. The buoyancy of Western Produce furnishes a striking commentary on the views of those who have erroneously supposed that its leading articles were ruling much higher in our market than at the West, and that prices had been inflated here by speculators. For some time past most of the receipts here from St. Louis have been sold at a loss; Corn being the only prominent exception, and it has advanced under the legitimate law of supply and demand, with very little aid from any speculative feeling. The cause of high prices must be looked for mainly in the cost of production, and the heavy indirect taxes paid by the farmer on every article he consumes. Until there is a general decline in prices we can hardly expect cheaper food, unless, under the influence of a supply so far exceeding the demand for home consumption as would compel sellers to come down to the limits of foreign orders. Hence the planters of the South will find that they consult their best interests by devoting as great a breadth of land as possible to the cultivation of Corn and other cereals, as well as to the raising of stock, all of which are more profitable at the current rates than our leading staple.

COTTON.—Sales have been to a liberal extent. On Saturday 5,500 bales changed hands at previous rates. On Monday the sales were 3,200 bales. Tuesday 3,000 bales were taken at prices showing a tendency in favor of buyers.

This makes an aggregate for the past three days of 11,700 bales, taken partly for the North, but mostly for foreign export.

The receipts proper since Friday evening comprise 2345 bales, against 2875 during the corresponding period last week, showing a decrease of 530 bales.

The receipts at this port, since the 1st of September, (exclusive of the arrivals from Mobile, Florida and Texas), are 654,034 bales, against 627,595 bales to same date last year, and the decrease in the receipts at all the ports, up to the latest date, as compared with last year, is 188,851 bales. In the exports from the United States to foreign countries, as compared with the same dates last year, there is a decrease of 85,558 bales to Great Britain, of 48,767 to France, and an increase of 34,046 bales to other foreign ports.

All the Members of the Patronizing Conference.

For the N. O. Christian Advocate.

BRITISH HONDURAS.

Mr. Editor:—To my great disappointment, I find myself still here, and shall not now be able to leave for Honduras before the 25th instant.

I add a few additional remarks

to my letter of last week, for those who may think of emigrating

to that point. The Colony is so near that emigrants should make their minds to encounter all the inconveniences of a new country.

The soil in most localities is well cleared for the planting of vegetables, rice, sugar, coffee, corn,

cotton, tobacco, the various fruits,

&c., and yields abundant harvests without cultivation. All the effects of immigrants are admitted

free of import duty; and the best

land can be had on very easy terms.

TIME FOR IMMIGRATING.

As less rain falls from December

to May, inclusive, that is the time

most favorable for moving into the country: immigrants would be less exposed camping until they could build houses; and that is also the best time for clearing lands. The seasons for planting are November and May. It is now late, but if emigrants could arrive at their destination by the last of this month

they might provide shelter, and plant enough to produce family supplies.

CHARACTER OF IMPROVEMENTS.

As there is no cold weather,

houses that will answer indispensable purposes can be very soon

built, and at little cost. Flooring and doors had better be taken from this country by those who emigrate before mills be put

there (which will be soon) to run lumber—all other materials

can be had on the ground.

ARTICLES TO BE PLANTED.

The first things planted should be vegetables, the seeds of which should be carried from here fresh.

After the garden vegetables usually produced in the Southern States,

the crops soonest reaped would be

rice and corn, seeds for which can be obtained there. Potatoes, sweet and Irish, for planting, should be taken from here. Yams, yampas,

&c., are procured there.—

Crops of all these may be realized

in four to six months. Plan-

tains, bananas, pine apples, &c., are important articles, and profitable also. Plantains are very productive and yield in about nine months—those, with yams, pota-

$50 currency for adults, children

half price; freights are $1 for dry

bbl., and $1½ for wet bbl.; 25c per cubic foot, etc. Flour, pork, and lard, had better be taken from here.

On arriving at Belize, transportation on reasonable terms can be readily had to any part of the Colony, where camps can be made in a very short time to shelter the family, until houses may be built,

which can also be made in a very plain style, in a very short time; and at a very little cost, with poles and thatch, which will afford protection from the weather—no

chimneys are needed as there is neither cold nor heat as here.

Cooking stoves should be carried from here as they are not to be had there. Plows, carts and wagons which would also have to be carried from here, will not be absolutely required there for the first year or so; as in that time

grass will not become troublesome,

and water conveyance and transportation is convenient almost everywhere. And even work

stock will not be indispensable in small operations for the first year or two. But of course families having such already, which are valuable and admissible free

of all duty, had better carry them along; as we will soon have a steamer adapted for carrying live stock, &c. All other implements, and clothing can be had on better terms there than here. Labor can be had there for about $8 per month, with rations.

D. W. FOSTER.

New Orleans, May 15, 1867.

From the New York Times.

THE MISSISSIPPI LEVEES.

Chiefly within the States of

Louisiana, Mississippi, and Arkansas, but extending also into Missouri, Tennessee, and a little into Illinois, there stretches along the course of the Mississippi a certain vast area of very rich land. Its extent is calculated at nearly fifteen millions of acres, being nearly as much as that of the entire State of South Carolina. Not less than seven million acres of it, or might be, brought under cultivation. That part of it already cultivated was reckoned ten years ago

to be worth $100 per acre, and the whole of it to be worth $260,000,

000. And at the same period—

cotton being then worth about nine cents a pound—it was also calculated that this land might be made to produce every year $315,000,000 worth of cotton. At the present quotation (about 28 cents a pound)

this annual production would amount to about $970,000,000 worth of cotton. Taxed two and a half cents a pound, this crop would pay to the United States annually

a tax of $87,500,000. This is more than the whole receipts of the width of the sidewalk with a series of transverse progresses.

What it does not thus cast behind it, the river carries suspended

as sediment in its current, or rolls

along its bed in sand, gravel or small balls of clay down and out into the Gulf of Mexico. Here the stream is brought to a stand by coming against the heavier salt

water, as if against a great soft wall. Thus halted, the heavily-laden river drops its burden, laying down every year in the Gulf a mass

of matter which would weigh, if dry, 812,500,000,000 pounds, and would pile up into a square cake

one mile on each side, and 268 feet high. This cake, if shaped to the lower extremity of New York City,

would cover it from the Battery up to a line drawn across the island at Franklin street, and to a thickness

just four feet higher than the steeple of Trinity church. The quantity of water which executes

this tremendous annual job of carriage is something far more tremendous, and is one of those colossal

totals which can not be apprehended

by the mind much better than the distance from the earth to a fixed star, or the real size and weight of the sun. It is, every year, 19,500,

000,000,000 cubic feet of water;

and if it could be ponded at 268

feet deep, so as to match its annual cake of sediment, it would occupy,

not one square mile, but 2900

square miles. It would fill a reservoir or lake 268 feet deep, and as large as the whole State of Delaware, and 800 square miles larger.

It is worth while to add, by way of further indicating the gigantic

scale upon which the great forces

of nature operate, that this vast body of fluid is only one quarter of the rain that actually falls each year in the various basins which together constitute the Valley of the Mississippi, and which that river drains. All the rest is either quietly sucked up into the air

again by the silent, mighty sun, or

is drawn away down into the secret

recesses of the earth, or is taken up by vital chemistry into the animal and vegetable productions

of the great valley.

But this is not all. These volumes of earth and water are averages. There are three floods every year in the Mississippi, coinciding

with the flow of snow water or rain water from certain of its upper tributary basins; and during these floods the transactions of the non-strous river exceed the totals just given. The great flood of 1858 has been decided to be a proper standard of maximum effort by the river.

The ordinary or average discharge of the river is 619,000 cubic feet a second—that is, during the time

while you now calmly repeat to yourself the word "deliberately,"

the Mississippi has pushed into the Gulf of Mexico a sheet of muddy water a foot thick and not far from 780 feet square. But in the flood of 1858 this rate of discharge more than doubled. It rose to 1,403,000 cubic feet per second.

This maximum is what the levees

must be able to confine within the channel. Can this huge torrent of one and a half million cubic feet of water every second be kept out of this seven million acres of arable

of the levees. Can man put a bride upon this levitation of a river

and say here you may go, there you shall not? The value of the property involved shows plainly

enough how profitable success

would be, and there have been abundance of losses to show how costly failure is. In the Texas bottom alone, for instance, in the single flood of 1850, the loss was $5,000,000. And it was stated that in Louisiana alone over 600,000 people are waiting for the employ-

the levees in that one State would

Other nations have achieved vast successes in the business of em-

banking. Holland has effectually shut out, not a river, but the even vaster and angrier forces of the stormy North Sea. On the coast of Zealand alone there are three hundred miles of dykes, standing

at an average of thirty feet above

the level of the country within, and costing every year, for repairs

alone, $800,000. The whole expense of Holland of keeping the ocean at arm's length is $3,000,000

a year, and this sum is of course

small compared with the original investment. That investment, and also the returns which follow, are

from time to time still increased.

THE N. O. Christian Advocate. SUPPORT OF THE BISHOPS.

MR. EDITOR: In looking over the last ADVOCATE, I find a statement of the deficits of several Annual Conferences, in the support of the Bishops. This statement shows that out of twenty-three conferences, only three have paid the full amount of the Bishops' claims. This certainly does not wear a healthy aspect. The report says, "this deficiency falls very heavily upon the noble men who are laboring so assiduously to promote the interests of the church." The Presiding Elders and Pastors are urged to adopt prompt measures to meet these deficiencies. We all agree that these deficiencies ought to be met. But the main question is how can they be met? The largest contributors to the support of the Bishops, have very heavy deficiencies of their own, which they cannot meet, and hence, it is not surprising that their contributions to this claim should fall off in amount. It is a generally conceded fact, that the preachers themselves give more to this Bishops fund than the rest of the church. This accounts for the failure to meet the Bishops' claims. The receipts of the preachers have fallen off to a large amount. The deficits of all the Bishops in all the conferences amounts to six thousand dollars, but the deficits of the thirty-one preachers reported in the Minutes of the Louisiana Conference, amounts to eight thousand and four hundred dollars. The deficits of the other forty-one preachers would perhaps double this amount. Louisiana, then, is behind at least $16,000, in meeting the allowance for her preachers, and one hundred and fifty-eight dollars in paying the Bishops' claim. Now, sir, do you suppose if those of our preachers who reported their allowance and receipts, had been paid, that this one hundred and fifty-eight dollars due the Bishop, would have stood against us on the books at Nashville? Certainly not. One little District of only four appointments, where the deficiency last year was thirteen hundred dollars, had it been met, would have paid this balance. This falling off in the receipts of the preachers, I think accounts for the deficiency to the Bishops' claim. The question, however is, how to pay this by the first of June? I propose this plan. Let each preacher advance what money he can spare and send it to the Book Agent to pay up this deficiency. In making his collections for the Bishop for the coming year, let him add the amount thus advanced to that to be raised, and when raised, let him repay himself what he has advanced.

It is true that most of the preachers are farther behind in their receipts than the Bishop; but if this balance due is to be paid, the preachers must do it, and it seems to me that the above plan will work the easiest. I simply throw out the hint. If the preachers see proper to raise this money some other way, I am content provided it is raised by the 1st June.

For the N. O. Christian Advocate. MISSIONARY MONEY—HOW TO GET IT.

DEAR ADVOCATE: Having never seen a regular plan for general use in raising missionary funds, and having adopted one, which reflection and partial trial, convinces me is a good one, I beg leave to submit it to your consideration.

But a few remarks first: The minutes show 7848 members in Louisiana. The missionary report shows receipts in the sum of $1871 for 1866. Suppose that each dollar stands for one contributor, then 5977 members of the Methodist Church in Louisiana paid nothing! If we say that each dollar stands for two subscribers, then 4106 members are left who paid not one dime to send the gospel to a dying world! Are these men and women Christians? Alas, for the heathen if God leaves them to such Christians. But "they have hard times, can barely support themselves, and must take care of their preachers at home." Look at the minutes, and you find that ever seventy ministers and their families have been compelled to live as best they could, on $23,000! or an average of 300 to each family. Now hard as the times have been, every minister has seen extravagance in the purchase of clothing, etc., among his members during this same year of 1866. Neither the ministers support has been furnished, nor the right amount is [sionary] money given, it is [cause the sense of duty did not exist! The church is certainly some poorer than it was, but the decrease of its wealth could not have caused this great deficit, if an honest attempt had been generally made to act from religious principle!

The plan I have adopted goes upon the principle that, it is the duty of every member to give something! I call upon every grown member of my church for one dollar in currency. No one is allowed to give more, no one less—except the children. In my book I have two columns, one Domestic, one Foreign. I put the dollar of each contributor in the column he designates. I get from all the members one dollar, if I can, in the early part of the year. Towards the close of the year I shall call on some eloquent brother, and get him to preach a good sermon on the subject. If I can't get the "eloquent brother," I'll do the best I can myself. The train having been laid—all having been prepared, it will be comparatively easy to fire up the liberality of the people, and get from the happy impulse of the hour what cold duty might have withheld. Thus, also, I give to these generous souls who disliked being tied down to one dollar, a chance to make it ten or twenty, and let their light shine at the same time!

Why cannot our treasurer report eight or ten thousand dollars at next Conference? The poverty of these eight thousand members will not hinder it. Where there is one so poor that he cannot pay one dollar there are five who can each pay two.

Thus the widow with only two mites may be made equal in the count by the rich man giving his dollar and her dollar too.

Adjectives.

We are great on adjectives. We are a go-ahead people; a people of strong impulses; and we wish to give adequate expression to our emotions, so we draw largely on the adjectives of our copious English tongue. In doing this, however, we sometimes make sad work of it, and if words were rational and capable of thought, they would sometimes be no little amazed at their situation, and the work they are expected to perform. "Mighty," for example, would find itself substituted for "very," and expected to express all the qualifications of that useful word. Mighty hard, mighty soft, mighty good, mighty bad, mighty long, mighty short; and, strangest of all, mighty weak. Mrs. Trollope said, "Americans said all things were elegant. Elegant lighting and elegant hogs." Now-a-days, "splendid" has come into use, and is employed to express all the ideas of which "excellent" would be the proper description. A splendid sun-rise, a splendid jewel, a splendid dress; and figuratively, a splendid edifice, a splendid man, from his showy and brilliant qualities; this will do. But splendid water, meaning cool, or healthy water, is certainly improper. Then you will hear of splendid butter, and most marvellous of all, "splendid Irish potatoes." How much more truthful and appropriate in all such attempts at description to say "excellent" butter, excellent potatoes. Then we are told its "awful" hot and "awful" cold. Sometimes that it is "terrible" cold, "terrible" hot, instead of quite hot or cold. Then we are told that a sermon or prayer were dreadful long.

How much more appropriate to say the sermon or prayer were very long, or too long. This improper use of adjectives leads to overstatement and exaggeration, and it destroys their force and effectiveness. To describe the sublime majesty of the storm, with its dark array of clouds, its vivid sheets and flashes of lightning and crashing thunders, its rushing winds and torrents of rain by the same word that we do a hot day, is to degrade and weaken the force of the word.

Words ought to be, among sensible and virtuous people, signs of ideas; but when a man says that some article is selling at an awful low or high price, or when a little dirty stern-wheel steamer is advertised as "the splendid and magnificent stern-wheel packet"—what does it mean? W.

From the Sabbath at Home.
Ancient Bible Manuscripts.

The discoveries made by paleographers in oriental monasteries, and their critical studies in the libraries of Europe, incidentally furnish many facts of interest to the general reader. He may not have the educational training necessary to appreciate fully the scientific value of their labors, or he may not control the leisure requisite to a minute investigation of their researches; but he would find even a cursory examination of their work attractive in the amount of interesting information it could give, and peculiarly stimulative of faith in the genuineness of our Christian Scriptures. It has been well said that the Bible is its own best evidence. When one can see for himself the marks of unmistakable antiquity in it, he is fortified against those attacks of infidelity which rely for their effectiveness on the ignorance of those to whom they are addressed.

We purpose to describe some of the historical minutiae of this most venerable book, thus putting our readers in possession of many facts concerning its unimpaired transmission, which are usually left in the hands of critics and scholars. We desire to make them familiar with the appearance and history of those ancient Scripture documents which have come down to us through centuries of war and ravage, of ignorance, of barbarism, of heathen rule, and of utter forgetfulness, bearing, with each renewed discovery, redoubled and multiplied authentication of our religious records. An attempt will be made to describe briefly some of the places where the most ancient Bible manuscripts have been found, to give an account of the present condition of those manuscripts, to examine their materials, the different styles of their writing, the marks of their antiquity, the methods of their manufacture and preservation, and their value among the external evidences of Christianity. Nothing will be said of the history of the printed text, and but little of the innumerable later manuscripts. Nor will there be any attempt at giving an account of Hebrew manuscripts of the Old Testament. We shall confine ourselves mainly to those documents, containing the whole or a part of the New Testament, which are more than a thousand years old.

THE LOCALITIES WHERE ANCIENT MANUSCRIPTS ARE FOUND.

The oriental monasteries are the chief repositories of such remains of the literatures of antiquity as have come down to our times. The Coptic convents of Egypt, desolate Nitria of the Libyan Desert, the religious houses on Sinai of the Arabian Desert, St. Saba near the Dead Sea, and the neighborhoods of Smyrna and Athens, have been visited again and again by zealous explorers. One of the most noted depositories of ancient libraries lies at the north-western extremity of the Aegean Sea. This is a peninsula within the present Turkish province of Salonica, about forty miles long and four broad. Across its mouth are still distinctly seen the remains of the canal cut by Xerxes in his invasion of Greece. The peninsula ends in Mount Athos, a promontory over six thousand feet in height, stretching out into the blue Aegean, and crowned with a peak of white limestone. It is called the Holy Mountain, and has been regarded with religious veneration in both ancient and modern times. Once its heights and sides were covered with religious houses, the chief occupation of whose inhabitants was the copying of manuscripts. It still sustains twenty monasteries and about eight thousand monks. In the libraries of these half ruined monasteries many of our most valuable Scripture manuscripts were preserved for centuries. It is very probable that others still repose in their vaults, either forgotten in the ignorance of the monks, or hidden by their jealousy,

to reward the skill and energy of future explorers.

Many priceless manuscripts of the Scriptures have been found in dilapidated monasteries of Nitria. This sandy waste stretches westward from the Delta of the Nile into the lonely burning plains of the Libyan Desert. One can hardly conceive of a locality less fitted for human habitations. Imagine a dusty road under the heats of mid-summer, enlarged in breadth and length into a whole region, diversified only by a few low hills with a surface of gravel-stones and dust, and you have the location of some of the chief treasure-houses of paleographical research before your mind's eye. This lonely waste once contained about three hundred Coptic convents. It has long been a scene of stagnation and decay. A few half-ruined monasteries are still found, each containing a score or less of "dirty, ignorant, barefooted monks," and a heap of old manuscripts huddled together in some vault or vacant cell, unvisited by its custodians, though clung to with a superstitious tenacity which only European zeal and gold could overcome. Here, in some long-forgotten cellar or tower, whole libraries have remained for ages in the process of slow decay; and here have been rescued volumes which could not be repurchased for ten times their weight in gold, manuscripts whose value to the critical scholar is incalculable. The very ignorance of the monks and the repulsiveness of the barren waste in which they lived have been the chief safeguards of these treasures.

The Nitrian monasteries are built on one simple plan. Each is square or nearly so; each is surrounded by a high wall; each supports a scanty garden, with perhaps a few palms. The monks crawl into such habitable cells as they can find among the ruins. Usually the entrance to the enclosure is commanded by a small, low bell-tower, separated from the rest of the convent by a draw-bridge. This tower, with its well, mill, oven, and store-room, is the fortress of the monastery. It usually contains all that is left of the ancient library. Tischendorf's remarks of the library cell, "no spot in the monastery could be safer from the visits of the fraternity than this. Here are often seen manuscripts heaped indiscriminately together. Lying on the ground or thrown into large baskets, beneath masses of dust, are found innumerable fragments of old, torn, or destroyed manuscripts." In a few Syrian cloisters, and some of those on the Aegean Sea, considerable care has been taken of the library. The volumes are placed in order on shelves or stored securely away in chests, and the whole collection is in the charge of some bookish brother who has the title of librarian. When this is the case, antiquarian explorers usually find difficulty in making any purchases, and it is sometimes impossible to secure even the privilege of seeing the library. But this is not true of the Nitrian cloisters. They have been ransacked from end to end; although it is still possible that some books of value have been retained by the cupidity of the monks, who are now aware that their neglected and decaying leaves of parchment often represent more money than all the rest of their possessions. "They are getting too much accustomed," remarks a German antiquarian, "to the visits and gold of the English."

CURIOUS RECEIPTABLES OF MONASTIC LIBRARIES, AND THEIR GENERAL CONDITION.

The towers described above are by no means the only containers of the books and manuscripts of which the monks have so long been the ignorant guardians. Sometimes a ruinous cellar or vault is discovered heaped full of manuscripts more or less destroyed by mold or storms. Ages ago, in a hurried day of peril from barbarian invasion, the whole precious library was thrown into the cellar and hidden over with rubbish. The attack came, perhaps the long siege, and the destruction or dispersion of the fraternity. Years or even generations after, the order was gathered again within its sacred walls. But their lay the library in the long forgotten cellar, unnoticed and uncared for by the illiterate tenants of the cloisters above. And in some cases there it still lies, untouched and undiscovered. Lord Budhoe, a few years since, found such a library by descending through a trap-door, candle in hand. He says, "To appearance it seemed as if, on some sudden emergency, the whole library had been thrown for security down this trap-door, and that they had remained undisturbed in their dust and neglect for some centuries."

In other monasteries the book-collection remains in the tower, accessible to the monks, and is in constant use; but what unworthy the convent had no library or manuscripts; and afterwards, on attending the religious services, have found "a double row of long-bearded, holy fathers, shouting the Kyrie Eleison, each of them standing, to save their bare feet from the dampness of the marble floor, upon a great folio volume." One explorer found precious vellum manuscripts, which are now the jewels of European collections, in use as coverings of large open preserve-jars. He suggested that he would supply other covers, which would answer that purpose quite as well, if the prior would let him have the old parchment books, and received, ready though wondering consent. In some apartments the floors were discovered strewn with books and fragments, scattered leaves written upon, ages ago, in Coptic, Syriac, or Arabic characters. In one of these old monasteries such a floor was found covered eight inches deep with manuscripts of greater or less antiquity.

An English paleographer, who is one of the most indefatigable and zealous explorers after these ancient leaves, had been told by a French friend that the books of a certain African monastery were somewhere in the oil-cellar, but that it was impossible to induce the monks to permit access to them. In his visit there, he professed a strong desire to see the oil-cellar. The prior refused permission. But at last, by cajolery and bribes, and the liberal use of his wine flasks, he gained his object. They reached the cellar by a narrow, gloomy staircase, found it a large vaulted apartment, with immense empty oil-jars ranged about the sides; but there were no books visible. At length he took the torch into his own hand, and made a narrow scrutiny of the whole vault. He discovered a small door opening into a narrow little stone closet, which was filled two feet deep with Syriac manuscripts. There he stayed for a long time, examining the mass of voluminous leaves, and studying their contents, notwithstanding the cloud of pungent dust, as well as he could under the flickering light which was held for him in turn by the sneezing monks. He informs us that that vaulted closet held manuscripts which now form one of the chief treasures of the British Museum.

Frequently the long neglect of these libraries is found to have resulted already in their entire destruction. The books have become solid masses, the manuscripts are decayed and entirely illegible. Nothing of value remains in what was once a magnificent library. Volumes which would pour a flood of light on the vexed questions of history, pages which would solve the most intricate critical problems, still exist, but have ceased to reveal a word of their contents. They remained open one century after another, but at last time and storm and human neglect proved too strong for them. The Scripture scholar can hardly find a more melancholy spectacle than one of these ruined monastic libraries. He feels, as he stands before it, that he has come too late. The fruit he sought has turned into ashes before he could reach it. Hon. Robert Cunzon, jr. tells the story of his coming upon such a library, in the following graphic word: "On my inquiring for the library, I was told that it had been destroyed. It had formerly been preserved in the great square tower, or keep, which is a grand feature in all the monasteries, I went to look at the place, and learning through a ruined arch, I looked down into the lower story of the tower, and there I saw the melancholy remains of a once famous library. This was a dismal spectacle for a devout lover of old books. It was indeed a heart-rending sight. By the dim light which streamed through the opening of an iron door in the wall of the ruined tower, I saw above a hundred ancient manuscripts lying among the rubbish which had fallen from the upper floor, which was ruinous, and had in great part given way. Some of these manuscripts seemed quite entire,—fine large folios; but the monks said they were unapproachable, for that floor on which they lay was unsafe, the beams below being rotten from the wet and rain which came in through the roof. Here was a trap ready set and baited for a bibliographical antiquary. I peeped at the old manuscripts, looked particularly at one or two that were lying in the middle of the floor, and could hardly resist the temptation. I advanced cautiously along the boards, keeping close to the wall, whilst every now and then a dull cracking noise warned me of my danger; but I tried each board by stamping upon it with my foot before I ventured my weight upon it. At last, when I dared go no farther, I made them bring me a long stick, with which I fished up two or three fine manuscripts, and poked them along towards the door. When I had safely landed them, I examined them more at my ease; but I found that the rain had washed the outer leaves quite clean; the pages were struck tight together into a solid mass, and when I attempted to open them, they broke short off in square bits like a biscuit. Neglect and damp and posture had destroyed them completely. One fine volume, a folio in double columns, of venerable antiquity, particularly grieved me. I was unable to save even scrap from this general tomb of whole races of books."

Such losses are irreparable, the wonder is that they are more frequent. Consider the lapse of centuries since the day when many of these books reached the last touch of the transcriber, the numberless social and political revolutions they have survived; spoliation and devastations have escaped, passing from the wearing use of one generation to the jealous hiding of another, the reckless neglect of another, lasting siege, pillage, conflagration in one age, lying untouched by the countless particles of sloth gathering dust, through the summers and winters of another. The very languages in which they were written are dead, the races which made them have passed away, the tides of civilization are flowing on distant unknown shores, yet these ancient memorials have come down to us with their imperable records, to verify our beliefs in what we hold most sacred and precious. The providence of God over his revealed Scriptures has been stronger than the storms, blights, the malice, the devastations, and the careless neglect of so many centuries. When the old monastic structure became too weak to serve as a fortress, its written treasures began to guard them as their gotten sepulcher. When the long of one period had done its worst for their conservation, they were safely committed to the stolid ignorance of another, secure from meddling, because above its knowledge. At length they have been disinterred to delight our eyes and confirm our faith. It is as if the Great Preserver had provided special resources of Christian evidence against the special attacks on the Bible in this century. The destructive criticisms of Germany on the Scripture text are unexpectedly answered from the ruined and forgotten monasteries of the Aegean Sea, the Levant, and the Libyan Desert.

TEMPERS.—In reading Mr. Wey's Sermons we are struck with the stress which he lays on tempers—he seems to count them the very essence of religion, so doing, we judge he is right. If he is, then the popular religion is very defective. A great many who profess, and call themselves Christians, are very cross, crabbed, querulous, spiteful, morose, touchy, revengeful—not to say malicious in their temper. Nor is this confined to men who are engaged in the turmoil of the world, where they are exposed to numerous provocations, which are not easy to bear. It is observable in the domestic circle. Mothers speak tartly, and peevishly, to their children. Mistresses scold and threaten their servants—rulo them with fear rather than love—

—take the harsher way,
When love would do the deed.

Why abuse—yes, that the worst abuse them for every misdeed, or mistake, or mishap, no matter how slight, or involuntary, or how much regretted. As we once had a planter in Alabama express it, we expect our servants to be great deal better than we are. We are afraid of spoiling them by kindness and gentle language; and refuse to commend them for a hundred commendable services, while we are fail to reprehend them for a single deviation. The spirit of kindness is not very strong within us, or the law of kindness would be on our tongue. As this will not be likely to be read by many of the inferior class, it is useless to descant on their faults and delinquencies in the premises. We have not, however, been unobservant of the Querulousness in the family circle, does immense mischief. Scolding spoils a good servant, and never improves a bad one. Then it is exceedingly disagreeable to other members of the family, in many instances retire to places of dissipation, to get away from din and strife of an angry tongue, and they thus are initiated into course of vice which ends in temporal and eternal ruin. Many misguide a wife and mother can fully endorse this statement. I revere should conscientiously set an example of kindness and courtesy to their children; and children should not be slow in imitating.

Let love through all your actions run.
Let all your words be mild:
Live like the blessed Virgin's Son,
That sweet and lovely child.

"Be courteous," says the Apostle—that is, Be polite. Abraham Tucker says: "Politeness is the skin of virtue; but our skin is part of us, and serves to protect and warm the flesh." But the politeness which the Apostle indicates is more than the skin of virtue; it enters into its very vitæ: as the law of love is in the heart, when the law of kindness is on the tongue.

THE ORGAN.

The Organ.
The hand strayed over the organ notes,
And there rose such music, sweetly grand,
As I listened I sighed and thought,
The notes are touched by an angel's hand.

The twilight stole through the diamond panes
Of summer breezes, sweet and clear—
And I gazed, I gazed, I gazed,
As I heard a sad thought,
A crown of glory is resting there.

Through the open window a murmur came
Of summer breezes, sweet and clear—
And I gazed, I gazed, I gazed,
As I heard a sad thought,
A crown of glory is resting there.

By her side in the golden light,
My hand on hers I laid—
O how I would always see you thus,
With fluttering lips I said.

And in that lonely room once more,
The golden light is fled,
And the hand that had strayed o'er the organ
Is motionless and dead.

I think of that evening long ago,
When our love had just begun,
I saw her sitting by my side
In the light of a dying sun.

I turned away from that darkened room,
With my two hands locked in prayer,
That I had seen her long ago
No more I see her there.

I might hear that angel's song,
And look in her changeless eyes,
From the light of a never-dying sun Shine on Paradise.

No amount of historical teaching or extent of observation seems to be sufficient to impress certain theories of the utter fallacy
and impracticability of their theories. God has given to some one, talent, to others two, and to others some, five talents. As the trees vary in size, and one star differs from another in glory, so variety
marks all the works of God.

As far as human society, and human progress are concerned, this is a most wise and beneficent arrangement. Could the theories of levelers be realized, society would be reduced to a vast and dreary monotony. There could be no progress, all would be equal, none would rise above the level, or advance beyond the common frontier.

It is praised that these short and absurd theories cannot be realized; but although they cannot be the attempt to do so,
they are made, and the experiment
costs vast mischief, and suffering.

The attempt to unite and execrate agrarian laws in the days of the Gracchi in old Rome, was protective of civil war with all its horrors. So the "liberty, fraternity, and equality," theories of France, drenched their country
with the blood of its best citizens;
and so it must ever be. All men are not, have never been, will never be equal in talents, virtue, acquirements or enterprise. These distinctions are inherent, and inevitable. It would be just as reasonable and wise to say that all cotton and sugar shall be of the same grade, and bear the same price, that there shall be no inferior, ordinary, low middling, and strict middling. These attempts never prove failures, but alas!
they are not harmless failures, they are sure to entail strife and blood,
and prove in the end the ruin of the weaker party. In social conflict, the victory ultimately lies with intelligence and capital, while those who possess not these elements of strength, always lose more than they gain. In view of these conclusions how unkind, not to say cruel is the course of those selfish aspirants for place and power, who propound and advocate these leveling, but impossible, and always destructive theories. W.

Moral and Religious Characteristics of Gen. Thomas J. Jackson.

A gentleman once told me that he had seen an artist draw a portrait, which, he held up before a circle of friends and asked them to name the original. No one could recognize the intended likeness. "Now," said the artist, "I will add a single line, and no one shall be able to mistake it." A single line was drawn, and instantly to all the face of a friend was revealed.

Thus meditating upon the character of Gen. Jackson, I often meet with traits that seem to confirm him with Caesar and Pompey, and Frederick, and Napoleon; but when I characterize him as a Christian, this individualizes him as himself alone. Take an illustration. In the eloquent History of the Rise of the Dutch Republic, occurs this sentence: "He possessed an iron will, which clove through every obstacle; and an adamantine fortitude, which sustained without flinching, a mountain of responsibility, sufficient to crush a common nature." Could words be uttered more strikingly characteristic, as far as they go, of General Jackson?—And of whom were they actually spoken by the historian? Of Alva! Alva, the greedy executor of the satanic cruelty and perfidy of Philip of Spain, the relentless murderer of the Netherlands, and the executioner of all subsequent history. Were Jackson and Alva then alike? Yes; but with what a difference! Draw the single line. Put in religion; let the iron will be swayed by the faintest whisper of conscience, and let the adamantine fortitude be based on faith in God, and Alva cannot be seen, while Jackson bursts full into view.

Since, then, the religious element in Jackson's nature, was the controlling element that moulded all others into conformity to itself, whoever would have a just view of him must take religion as the standpoint.

I will therefore commence by giving you what I have been able to learn of the earlier part of his religious history. The materials for this purpose are not as abundant as would be desirable for even a brief sketch as would be appropriate in this place; for he rarely spoke of himself—of his inner or his outer history, never—unless induced by others to do so. Nor was his correspondence by letter less reticent. This was never extensive, and were it collected, together it would not, I am inclined to think, afford to his biographer much personal revelation of his religious experience. It would, however, be rich in intimation and illustration of his faith and holiness, being pervaded and saturated with a Christian spirit to a degree not often found in the writings of even professed devotees.

Nothing is known to me of any manifestation of religious sentiment by him during his boyhood and early youth, except that he assured a friend, with whom he conversed upon such subjects of "tender" perhaps than with any one else, that when a boy about ten years old he was very deeply impressed by the triumph in death of his mother and his elder brother, Joseph, both of whom were, I believe, members of the Methodist Church. Do we here get at the secret of the piety of the distinguished son in the answered prayers of the humble, unknown, pious mother? And is this another of the many illustrations of the fact that great men are so often descended from great mothers? If Bonaparte traced his military genius to the character of Letizia, and her training of him, it is as reasonable, and more in accordance with God's truth, to allow to Jackson a hereditary claim to piety through his great mother—in God's sight, if truly pious, truly great.

At West Point he was not recognized as a religious man. Nevertheless, his strict attention to duty as a cadet, and his high-toned morality, were tokens of the deep religious elements of his nature. I remember to have heard him say that the only act of deception he ever practiced as a cadet was, that one evening, having walked a short distance beyond the prescribed limits, and seeing an officer of the academy approaching, he concealed himself behind a tree until the officer had passed. As he made no profession of religion until a later period of his life, we may conclude that he had not at any earlier time apprehended the subject of religion in its personal relations to himself, nor felt that duty called on him to be in faith or practice any thing different from what he was. For this trait was eminently characteristic of him at all times, that his practice corresponded with his theory. He never wasted either thought or feeling; whatever his reason told him was right, or proper emotion prompted him to do; he did at once, and would be unhappy if he delayed to do it. He explored a country not speculatively, not to enjoy the picturesque, but that he might find out the best route for a march, and that ascertained, the head of the column was at once directed upon it.

From conversations held with him, I am led to believe that the first person who brought distinctly to his view the duty of making a public profession of religion was Col. Frank Taylor, of the 1st artillery, then serving in Mexico, and numbering among its subordinate officers Lieut. Jackson, of Captain Magruder's battery. This Christian officer, Col. Taylor, himself a member of the Episcopal Church, attracted, no doubt, by the high qualities exhibited by his subordinate—his bravery, resoluteness, and devotion to duty, his high-toned principles and pure morality—would often invite him to his headquarters, there to converse with him about man's duty to his Maker and Redeemer, and to spread before him in an attractive way the solid pleasures of the true Christian. Doubtless his teachings were made emphatic by the example of his life, for Col. Taylor was esteemed one of the best men in the army. Doubtless, too, his fervent prayers were offered for the Divine blessing upon his efforts to lead his young friend into the more perfect way. I am sure that Jackson ever regarded him as the instrument in leading him at that time to the serious consideration of those truths which afterward were the basis of his character, the essence of his strength, and the unfailing source of his purest joys. How imperfectly we understand the influences which we may be exerting upon the infinite series of events evolved in the unseen future! In the retrospect of his Mexican service, Col. Taylor certainly would not have called up as more important than any thing else he did these leisure conversations with his young lieutenant. Yet without that change in his inner life, which dated its commencement from these conversations, Jackson could not have been what he was—the most brilliant pages of our country's history would have been unwritten, and one example less would have illustrated for Christendom the power of God's truth and the faithfulness of his promises. How inscrutable are the providences of Him who turneth the hearts of men as he does the streams that run among the hills! God means, almost a quarter of a century after this, to give a Christian hero, as a standard-bearer, to a Christian people struggling for his truth, as well as for their rights, and he selects him now, himself as unconscious of his destiny as the world is ignorant of him, under the shadows of the mountains of Central America, and begins to train him for his great work.

With his mind once directed to special thought on any practical subject, Jackson had already commenced the career of duty. For, as has been said, he never wasted thought. Beginning to think, he thought on, until he thought out solid conviction, and conviction put in motion the advancing foot of action. But deliberateness was as characteristic of him as was promptness. He disliked haste, and always took time for consideration, whenever it was practicable. Having resolved to be a Christian, he addressed himself calmly to the inquiry as to which branch of the Christian Church he should connect himself with. His relations to Col. Taylor would naturally incline him toward the Episcopal denomination, and I think I have understood from him that, at first, he had a bias for it. But he was not a man to be swayed by secondary motives, in a matter of importance; and he was just the man who, in the investigation of truth, could deliver his mind from any accidental bias. He determined, in the consideration of the serious question he had proposed to himself, to be impartial. He began by examining the claims of that Church which calls itself the oldest, and which is unquestionably the most arrogant—the Church of Rome. His opportunities for this were unusually favorable. His position gave him easy access to the Archbishop of Mexico, and he was most courteously received by this dignitary. He impressed Jackson as a man of ability, sincerity, and candor. The exposition he made of the tenets of his Church, attributed to misrepresentation much that is commonly objected to it. No doubt he used, in order to win over the young officer of the conquering army that occupied his country, all that skill to which the Roman Catholic priesthood is trained. According to Jackson's report of the interviews, the Archbishop must have softened down in theory the more assailable features of his system considerably below the point which, practically, they are found to assume. And this not without effect upon his auditor; for Jackson, throughout life, entertained a more tolerant regard for the Roman Catholic religion than is usually found in the earnest portion of the Evangelical Church.

The match was apparently a very unequal one between the trained priest and the earnest but untrained neophyte. But to some noble natures there seems to be vouchsafed a divine instinct, which rejects hurtful error. Jackson could not accept as the only true Church one that prayed to saints, and hoped to share their supererogatory merits—that attributed infallibility to mortal man, and placed in the hands of the priests the power of absolving from sin, while it denied the Word of God to the people.

The scene, to us looking back upon it, with all we know, seems strange indeed.

Jackson, who won his immortal cognomen of Stonewall at the head of a brigade of Scotch-Irish Presbyterians, and who was in every fiber of his frame and every pulsation of his noble heart an American, and a Virginian, asking a Spanish Archbishop whether he ought not to be a Roman Catholic! A spirit as free as God ever put into a mortal frame standing at the opening door of a cage—the man with whom truth was a passion rather than a principle, conferring with Jesuitry—the Israelite, in whom was no guile, coming to Atholphei for counsel, and the man whose simple taste abhorred all pomp confronted with the pageantry of the Vatican! Had the Archbishop succeeded in winning to his faith this young convert, how different would have been the life of our hero; and, perhaps, how different, too, the history of our country! For whatsoever else Jackson might have accomplished as a Catholic, he could not have achieved precisely what he did.

The Episcopal Church next occupied his attention, and with it he was sufficiently satisfied to make a public profession of Christian faith, and to become a communicant according to her rites. This took place at Fort Hamilton, under the ministry of the Rev. Mr. Parkes. His connection with this Church was not, however, fully consummated, nor was it regarded by himself as absolute. On the contrary, he explicitly informed Mr. Parkes that it was provisional, that he purposed to continue his investigations, and if afterward he should discover a Church whose doctrines and rites were, in his opinion, more exactly accordant with Scripture, he would transfer his present inchoate membership to it. Whether he objected to one or more of the tenets or rites of the Episcopal Church, or whether he regarded the whole, as a system, incomplete, I am not able to say. I feel well assured, however, when I express the belief that from the first he expected to find a Church more satisfactory to him than the Episcopal, and that his quasi-connection with it proceeded from his conviction that duty forbade him longer to delay an open profession of Christian faith.

In 1851 he came to Lexington as a Professor in the Virginia Military Institute. Here, for the first time, he was introduced into a Presbyterian community, and enjoyed a favorable opportunity for becoming acquainted with the doctrines, rites, and practical workings of Presbyterianism. It seemed to him more scriptural in its doctrines and organization, and more efficient in its personal influences, than any thing he had met with before in his impartial and pains-taking search after truth. A nature like his is just the one to delight in thorough Calvinism. He would admire the reverent wholeness with which it adopts the whole of the revealed word of God, undeterred by apparent difficulties—its resolute rejection of mere human authority, the intellect of its logic, and the rigidity of its morals. Its history, too, would charm him, illustrated as it is by the military achievements of many of its heroes, signalized by the bravery of the populations over which it has had sway, and glorified by its steady alliance with civil liberty. The general harmony between his career and his Presbyterianism was universally recognized, and Stonewall Jackson and Presbyterian Elder were designations of him, alike descriptive and suggestive.

FARM AND GARDEN.

From the American Farmer.

CULTIVATE FRUIT.

The beautiful weather which we may now expect, will produce a most delightful change in the face of Nature. We cannot look upon this marvellous change without the most pleasurable emotions, feeling that all nature is rejoicing in the name of its great Creator, and proclaiming, "the hand that made us is divine." The present state of the weather by which we are now surrounded, combined with the fine autumn of last year, and our comparatively mild (though prolonged) winter, may reasonably lead us to hope for abundant crops of all kinds of fruit. As regards peaches we do not remember to have seen fruit blossoms in a more promising condition. (Apr. 15.) Where fine peaches are a desideratum, disbud (remove soon after they have burst into leaves such buds as, if allowed to grow into shoots, would be misplaced, or overload the tree with young wood) the trees as soon as possible, as the shoots will be crowding each other, but be careful not to overdo it at once as the leaves shelter the young fruit, and there may be frost during the first few days of the month sufficient to injure it. Circumstances permitting, we should be careful to regulate the shoots of all our peach, and nectarine trees, so as to give all the light and air possible. Soon as the shoots acquire consistency, we are careful to remove them with a sharp knife, as breaking them off would very much disfigure and injure the trees.

All fruit planted during the late fall and spring, should have timely and careful attention. After a tree has been transplanted, however well done, the first step has only been taken as to its ultimate success. Much will depend upon the treatment it receives during the earlier stages of its growth, more particularly the care bestowed upon it during the first summer. As soon as the hot weather arrives, or sooner, the ground around the trees for several feet should be well mulched with old straw, which we have found to be about the best material for the purpose; our practice has been to put it on four or five inches thick, which keeps the top soil throughout the dryish time in summer quite moist, thus preventing the trees suffering from drought. It moreover prevents the weeds giving any trouble during the summer months, and artificial watering for a tree thus mulched has never to be resorted to. We remember a friend who had a quantity of young peach trees, which had been so much injured by drought as to cease growing, and assumed a very sickly appearance, but by stirring the soil in early spring, and mulching around them some five or six feet, in a very few weeks they commenced to grow, and in the succeeding summer were in a very healthy condition, notwithstanding it was a very dry one. We believe that keeping the ground in young orchards well cultivated is very essential to success. This system we have not failed to advocate for many years, and have heard many exclaim, we cannot afford to give all this attention to fruit trees; it will not pay! Not pay! to give proper attention to trees after having paid a good price for them. The best orchards in this country, those that are celebrated for their uniform magnificent fruit, and which are paying orchards, we find to be those which are kept clean by cultivating, harrowing, &c., in connection with a system of "thorough drainage," and application of manure whenever necessary, with no vegetable or cereal crops permitted between the rows. It is not unfrequently that there is much difficulty experienced in cultivating between the rows of fruit trees; a two-horse team with double whiffle-trees are generally used for the purpose, the result of which is lacerated bark, and broken branches. Upon level ground, and where it has not become hard, one horse, with a very short whiffle-tree, and the traces considerably lengthened, will be found quite sufficient, and with this the work can be very easily and well performed.

Strawberries ripening under glass should have a comparatively dry air, and plenty of ventilation, or they will lack flavor and color. If a few fine strawberries are preferable to many, let the first take the lead and swell off, removing the greater part of the later ones. This practice we consider of the greatest importance in growing the fruit for its seed, wherewith to raise new varieties. Where strawberries have been grown in pots and the fruit picked, instead of consigning the plants to the rubbish heap, plant them in some well prepared soil; keep them well cultivated and free from weeds, giving occasional waterings of liquid manure during the summer, and note the result. Run the hoe through the rows of strawberries that no weeds be left; soon as the fruit commences to swell cover the ground with straw or grass to keep it moist, and the fruit clean.

Make frequent applications of manure water to grape vines, strawberry beds, fig, and other fruit trees in pots and tubs. We have made it a practice to apply liquid manure to all kinds of fruit trees, and growing crops, and with the most satisfactory results. We advise varied and frequent applications rather than a few strong doses. Hence sewage in its full strength is too strong for some crops, but with from two to three parts of water added, it will answer admirably. In no other respect whatever have we a word to say against liquid manure. We have before stated that by looking after the soap-suds, house sewage, &c., many of our crops might be doubled; we hope to be able to soak our strawberry beds with it, and expect our labor will be rewarded tenfold. In all such waterings we are careful not to wet the foliage any more than possible. Now is the time to look well after the weeds, and not allow them to obtain a footing; the best way is to destroy them before they are an inch high, which may be done with half the labor required when they are more advanced. The easiest and most economical way is to keep the surface clean of them at all seasons. Complete all work in this department, as indicated for the last two months, early as practicable, more especially the planting of fruit trees. We close our remarks with the advice of the old laird of Dunbeldies, (in the "Heart of Mid Lothian") to his son just before he shuffled off his mortal coil: "Jock, when ye hac naething else to do, ye may aye be stickin' in a tree; it'll be growin', Jock, when ye're sleepin'."

VANILLA.—Vanilla is one of the few economical products of that remarkable family of plants known as Orchids, or Orchidaceae so prized by the florist for the great beauty of its flowers, and so interesting to the botanist for the wonderful modification of structure the flowers present. We have a number, such as the Lady's Slippers, Orchids, etc., which are all terrestrial, or grow in the soil, but in the tropics, where they abound, most of them grow on the branches of trees, and draw all their sustenance from the air; hence when the plants are cultivated in our hot-houses, they are popularly known as air "plants." The Vanilla differs from most other orchids in being a climbing vine. It throws out great numbers of aerial roots, by which it clings, and produces very thick, shining leaves. The flowers of the Vanilla are not as showy as those of most of the family, and are produced in clusters that are succeeded by bunches of long slender pods, which are the "beans," of commerce. It is worthy of note that the flowers of the Vanilla are in like manner dependent upon the help of insects, or they will produce no fruit.

In tropical America, the native home of the plant, there are insects which understand how to do this, but in the East Indies, where the plant is cultivated, they are either not the right sort of insects, or they are less acute than the American ones, as the Vanilla produce no fruit unless the flowers are fertilized by hand. The pods are some 6 or 8 inches long, narrow, three-sided, and if allowed to remain on the plant, finally burst into three valves or parts, and scatter the minute black seeds. The pods are gathered when fully developed, dried in the sun, and afterwards rolled up in parcels, where they undergo a sort of fermentation, or sweating process, to develop the odor. It is said that the fruit allowed to dry without this treatment possesses very little aroma. The pods are afterwards oiled, done up in bundles, and sent to market. The best will be found to be frosted with minute crystals, which are the aromatic principle. The name of this plant is Vanilla aromatica; Vanilla is a Spanish word, meaning a little pod. The Tonqua Bean, Sweet-scented Vernal-grass, Seneca grass, Melilot, and some other plants, have an odor resembling that of Vanilla, and contain the same or a very closely related aromatic principle. Indeed, the Tonqua Bean is often substituted for Vanilla in flavoring, and the "Extracts of Vanilla" are frequently wholly, or in part, made of it. The Tonqua Bean is much less expensive than Vanilla, but the substitution can only deceive those who are not familiar with the flavor of the two. Not only is Vanilla largely used to flavor ice-cream, but for custards, russets cakes, and many other delicacies. Probably a reliable extract is the handiest form in which to use it. The best way to use it is to beat it in a mortar, with sufficient hot sugar to finely divide and powder it, and to absorb all the oil. This is to be kept closely stopped. Ag.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Rev. J. T. Curry, P. E., Tallahassee, Fla., writes under date of April 15th: "There is much suffering in all this portion of the State, and the enormous railroad freight charges a large amount of the money furnished by the hands of benevolence for the relief of the destitute widows and orphans, who but for this, might be tolerably well supplied until the ripening of the present very promising wheat crop. Let all the Church of God pray for the blessing of the country with an abundant harvest."

BARTHOLOMEW CIRCUIT, LOUISIANA.
CONFERENCE, April 15, 1867.
Rev. J. C. KEENER.

Dear Brother—Please say to the friends of Zion through the Advocate, that prospects are brightening up very fast.

When we arrived on the work, we found the Circuit disorganized, and with no disposition on the part of the members of the church, to help the preacher spiritually or temporally. Since we have commenced the work, however, prospects have brightened up very much. The congregations are increasing rapidly, and becoming more and more interested upon the subject of religion. Our second quarterly meeting is over; the people are coming up to the preacher's support, and say that they shall be supported. We are looking forward and anticipating a glorious revival. Oh Lord, disappoint us not!

We have four large colored congregations. Quite a revival spirit among them. We have had five conversions and twenty-nine accessions to the church. They seem to have a great aversion to negro preachers. Negro missionary preachers will not do much in this country; the colored population do not want them. I hope to send them reports of glorious revivals amongst whites and blacks. brethren, pray for us.

W. D. STAYTON.

Real Want.

We copy two items from the Nashville Christian Advocate, which tell the actual straits into which some of our most laborious and faithful men have come:

We have received the following touching letter from an estimable minister of one of our Annual Conferences. If its publication should prove any to afford relief, it will be a worthy brother through the Publishing House. We would be delighted to be made the almoner of his gratuity. We suppress names. Our correspondent says:

It is with much pain that I address you, but anxiety for those dependent upon me constrains me to do so. I have a family of ten to provide for, and such is the condition of things in this country, and my want of capital, that it is next to impossible for me to get bread, to say nothing of other things. A little molasses and a small supply of milk constitutes our daily round; to meat, we have not had a full meal in a month. I am working at it, but so little is doing that it is not sufficient for our wants. My oldest children do what they can to help, but can't do much. I have a little mill that now and then furnishes us with a little additional. I have not received one dollar from the Church this year; and the great trouble is, that the majority are in like condition. Now, my brother, can't you give some direction to this communication that might assist me even a little. Money or provisions will be thankfully received, and my prayers will ever go up for the Church. It may seem indelicate that I should speak thus of myself, but Heaven knows I cannot tell what else to do.

Another writing from the Indian Mission Conference says:
Mr. Editor:—Will you print? Will your patrons read? Will the people hear one word from the Indian Mission Conference?
In 1844 we were brought into existence, under many doubts and difficulties. Many doubted, some positively opposed, and but few, if any, were approved. For twenty-two years we have made our annual quadrennial examinations, and still we have at least a name to live. A few years ago we were examined by about one hundred and fifty doctors at once, in close consultation. They decided that the vital spark was not extinct, and that good nursing, with prudence, might restore us. Having been on very light diet for the last five years, the doctors decided that we needed, and should have, something a little stronger during the present year. Full six months of the time has passed, and not one morsel have they given us. We are still on our light diet, and we do declare it does seem that we never will gain any strength on it. It seems to be as liquid as the very air itself. We read in the papers of showers of manna (bank bills) descending. One cries out, "Hold!" but the great doctor says: "Never mind—let it rain!" and so it does. This was somewhere in the East, but the clouds have not drifted this way. The doctors said we must exercise freely in the open air (carry on the work). This we have done by riding a borrowed mule two hundred miles back and forth, besides many other tours over the wide wastes of our country. And the traveling around on a Presiding Elder's district, piercing the recesses of the mountains, and extending over the vast prairies even to the Western extremity of our bounds, where the chattering bark of the thousand prairie-dogs seemed to dispute our right to invade their quiet homes, as we passed through their towns, treading upon their smoothly worn streets, and driving them hurriedly into their labyrinthine burrows. After weeks of absence we return home. Want and destitution stare us in the face on every hand: the meal is low, the meat out; no money, no friends that can help in these things; the last pony has been sold for bread. Our clothes are all old, patched, and darned—wife tells us that our best coat, which has brought us comfortably through nine winters, can not be darned any more so as to keep it decent. We knew it, but can't help it. The children, dear ones! not sensible of their destitution—nor would we have them be—need schools and schooling, books, and many other things, but there is no chance for them. Once we could work with our hands, but twenty-two years of toil and exposure has so far exhausted our physical strength that we can no longer do this. We sit us down and weep, and wonder how long this state of things must continue. Certainly we can not live very much longer under it—how much we do not know, but we think about September next we will breathe our last.

LOUISIANA ITEMS.

THE FLOOD.—We are informed by P. A. Roy, Esq., an old resident of the parish of Pointe Coupee, that the flood poured in upon that parish through the break in Grand Levee is more destructive than any known for a number of years past. Nearly the whole area of the parish is under water. The beautiful country along False River is under water with the exception of a narrow strip ranging from one to ten arpents along the front, and in many places this strip is covered by the water pouring over the road into False River. The "Island" also is nearly submerged, the water in False River having nearly reached the summit of its bank, has backed up into the swamps and interior of the "Island" through the drains of the plantations to a level with the river, leaving but a narrow strip not submerged. Point Coupee, like our own parish, suffered much from the overflows of the few past years, and we may justly presume the suffering among the poor, and they are many, both white and black, throughout her borders, will be great. Such, indeed, we are assured it must be unless relieved.

In our parish the flood still spreads, notwithstanding the fall in the river. Fine deer are killed within a short distance of our town, having been driven from the swamps by the water. This fun for our sportsmen is but poor consolation, however, for the wide-spread ruin so near us and the sad prospect before us.—Iberville South, 4th.

THE OVERFLOW IN ST. MARY.—On the 4th inst. there was nearly ten feet more water in Bayou Teche at Franklin than ordinary tide. At that time, says the Banner, the plantations on the south bank of the Teche for forty miles, in St. Mary's parish; the plantations of Bayou Sale, a distance of nearly twenty miles; those of Cyprienot, a distance of nearly twenty miles; The Au Large Prairie, a surface of from seventy-five to one hundred square miles, and four islands, with a tillable surface of nearly eight thousand acres, are still free from overflow; and less than two thousand dollars will pay for all the levees that have been built on that bank of the Teche for a hundred years.

The same paper says that up to the time of writing, the high water has been constantly extending its surface, and downright suffering has begun to stare the inhabitants in the face. In the lower part of the parish, from the mouth of the Teche to the Bonif, and beyond, there are but few people that have not been put to great inconvenience. Most of them have nothing but suffering and distress before them, and large numbers would be suffering for bread had it not been for the timely assistance of the government. On the north side of the Teche, below Centerville, and near that village, the freedmen have been obliged to abandon their cabins and seek shelter on the south side of the bayou on higher lands. They are in great distress, and hardly know where to go to secure shelter and food.

Above Franklin, in Irish Bend, on the north side of the bayou, enough cane is under water to have made a thousand hog-heads of sugar, besides a large surface of corn and potatoes. Many hands are now out of employment and are seeking labor in other places. But little harm has been done on the south side of the Teche, except for a few rods along the bank of the bayou, to gardens and fruit trees. Though the water on Thursday evening stood six inches above the high water mark of 1865, the Main street in Franklin, and the public road by the bayou above, stood about three feet above the rise, showing that the ridge of the bank is about twelve feet six inches above tide water, and the bank is higher as we advance up the bayou towards New Iberia.

The editor of the Civic Guard lately attended a radical meeting at Houma, parish of Terrebonne. From his account, the meeting was to organize a party to induce the negroes of Terrebonne to hate the white folks of that parish. That is what it all means. Malice and hate are the great screw and lever powers now used to squeeze the last life blood from the South. "Hate your employer who honestly pays you your monthly wages! Hate a robbed and ruined people! Hate the man whose money feeds you and clothes you and your children! Embrace the stranger who teaches you to hate; and who, in consideration for such teachings, demands your money and your vote!" That's the thunder for the campaign of 1867.—Banner.

Distress in West Louisiana—Important Action by the Mayor of Brashear City.

The following telegraphic correspondence passed on Wednesday, between Mayor Marks, of Brashear City, and the headquarters district of Louisiana, with regard to the relief needed for sufferers by overflow in that section of the State:

BRASHEAR CITY, May 8, 1867.

To Major Armstrong, A. Q. M., Bureau R. F. and A. L.:

Can you give us authority to press a boat for the purpose of taking off the drowning men, women and children on the bayons in the submerged district? The boats in this trade seem all to be intent only on making money from the sufferings of their fellow-beings, with the exception of the Hetty Gillmore, Captain Deballion, who has done and is still doing all he can. They seem to be deaf to the calls of suffering humanity.

There are now a great number of poor creatures with their little all perched on rafts and literally starving on the bayons below, anxiously looking for relief.

We have applied to Captain Keller, at Franklin, but have no response. Every one here that could get away has gone. The depot is filled with women and children, of all colors, waiting to get off. Unless we are able to command transportation, God knows what they will do.

S. F. MARKS, Mayor, etc.

H. H. POPE, Collector.

May 8, 1867.

Hon. S. F. Marks, Mayor of Brashear City, Louisiana:

Seize any available steamer and use for purposes mentioned in your telegram.

Do not detain the steamer longer than is absolutely necessary.

By command of Brevet Major General Mover.

WM. H. STERLING.

Captain 1st U. S. Infantry, Acting A. A. G.

May 7, 1867.

To Lieut. J. W. Keller, Ass't. Sub. Ass't. Com. Bureau R. F. and A. L., care of Hon. S. F. Marks, Mayor of Brashear City, La., who will please forward, without delay, to Franklin, La.:

You will proceed immediately to Brashear City, and distribute rations there. Should you require more rations, telegraph at once.

WM. H. STERLING.

GENERAL NEWS.

Richmond, May 11.—The crowd around the Spotswood Hotel dispersed after vainly waiting to see Mr. Davis. He has a private parlor and takes his meals in his own room. This evening he received the visits of nearly one hundred of our most prominent citizens, among them the pastor of St. Paul's church, from whom he first received the news of the breaking of Lee's lines.

He said little about his imprisonment, but spoke in terms of the warmest affection of ex-President Pierce, who visited him on Thursday last. He said there was no man living for whom he entertained a higher regard.

At Brandon, on the way up, a number of ladies had gathered to speak to him, who shed tears on seeing him. They nearly all had been acquaintances of his family during the war.

Richmond, May 14.—Gen. Schofield has ordered the Lincoln Mounted Guards, colored, to disband, and has prohibited their parades or drills.

Horace Greeley and Gerritt Smith, who had come on to sign Mr. Davis's bail bond, are addressing the people at the African church to-night. The audience is largely colored.

An intimate friend of Mr. Davis says he has no fixed plan for his movements until November. Mr. Davis will reside in Norfolk.

St. Petersburg, May 11.—The telegraph line hence to the mouth of the Anioor river, was completed to-day.

London, May 10.—During the debate Gladstone said the Government Reform Bill was a shallow, transparent, dissimulating pretense of the extension of franchise.

Bright declared the bill the most unjust and offensive measure ever submitted to Parliament.

Roebuck and Disraeli defied the bill.

Strangers were excluded during the division.

The announcement of the result, sixty-four majority, produced protracted cheering from the ministerial benches.

Lord Stanley in the House congratulated the country that the good sense and moderation of the peace conference has had the effect of arresting the unspeakable calamities of a European war. [Loud cheers.]

He explained that the treaty of 1839 guaranteed Luxembourg to Holland. What the Government had now done was to adopt that guarantee to the present circumstances.

MONETARY.

The commotion and wonderment in regard to the two banks which have occupied so much attention, is greatly alleviated—only, however, as to one of the institutions. The First National is still in the hands of the Treasury agent, or visitor; the other institution, the City National, on Magazine street, was hard pressed by its depositors during Monday and yesterday, having paid out in the two days four hundred and fifty thousand dollars. As it was evident Tuesday morning a run would be made, preparations were made to appeal for assistance to other banks, which was responded to promptly by one bank Tuesday, and three others yesterday. The amount required was only $100,000, which has been of immeasurable service to the credit and standing generally of our city. The other National Bank, the Louisiana, has not been called on by its creditors, being abundantly able to meet all demands and help its cotemporary.

OBITUARIES.

DEAR BROTHER: I write to inform you of the deep and peculiarly painful affliction of Brother G. H. Clinton and family. Yesterday we placed in the silent grave the body of dear little SALLIE BARNES CLINTON, aged 7 years and 2 months. The circumstances of her death render it peculiarly painful. On Friday afternoon all the family had collected in one room, and were enjoying one of those hours of domestic happiness, so deeply interesting in an itinerant's home before he leaves for appointments. Little Sallie quietly withdrew from the circle. In a few moments the family were startled by her cries, and found her entirely enveloped in flames from her burning clothes. The fire was instantly extinguished, but it had already performed its terrible work.

She gave the full particulars of the occurrence. Going into her mother's room, she found a match, scratched it, her dress caught fire, finding she could not put it out alone, ran across the gallery to the room where the family were collected. You readily imagine the scene.

Brother and sister Clinton's hands were badly burned in their efforts to save their child. The little sufferer through the night manifested a degree of patience and fortitude, becoming one of mature age and christian experience, often saying, "I will be well to-morrow." It was so. Saturday morning smiling sweetly, she closed her eyes as in peaceful sleep upon a mother's bosom, and breathed her last. On the holy Sabbath, at the hour her father and grandfather had so often preached the Resurrection and Eternal Life, we placed her body in the silent grave to await "the voice of the archangel and the trump of God."

"When what we now deplore Shall rise in full, immortal prime And bloom to fade no more."

Yours truly,
J. A. G. JONES.

We deeply sympathize with our dear friends in their sad affliction. Edw.]

Sister CAMILLA V. WARD, wife of W. R. Ward, died at her residence in Morehouse, parish La., March 18th, 1867, of congestion of brain. Sister Ward was born in Virginia, and raised in Alabama, where she was united in wedlock with W. R. Ward, on the 21st of September, 1851; and moved shortly after to Morehouse, parish La. Sister Ward professed religion and joined the M. E. Church, South, in 1860, under the administration of Rev. Samuel Haws. She lived in the church from that time till death.

She leaves an affectionate husband and four children to mourn her loss; but their loss is her eternal gain. The writer, though he had but a short acquaintance, will not soon forget the smile upon sister Ward's face when first he met with her, and informed her that he was the circuit preacher. She is a loss to the poor circuit riders, as well as to the family, friends, and church.

The soul of our sister is gone To brighten the triumph above:
Exalted to Jesus's throne,
And clasped in the arms of his love.

A SONG FOR THE DEAD.

BY GEORGE W. FISHER.

A song for the dead—the dreamless dead—
Oh! let the tears of the heart be shed,
Like the dew of night, o'er the flowers that wee.

In withered beauty above the grave,
They come no more from their homes of rest,
To light up hope in the lonely breast;
They know no rest—and the stars we shed,
Unheeded fall o'er the dreamless dead.

A song for the dead—the lovely dead,
That lie on the cold and narrow bed,
In the charmed aisle, in the azure deep,
Where the midnight stars their vigils keep;
Where breezes chant, and the moonbeams fair
Float down their love on the sleeping air,
To sigh o'er the cold and narrow bed,
A requiem dirge for the lovely dead.

A song for the dead—the holy dead—
Their forms remain, but the soul has fled;
For alas! there seems no joy to dwell
Where once the smiles of their brightness fell;
They passed away like a gleam of light
From clouds that hung on the brow of night,
Cold, dark and sad, when the light has fled,
And day is passed with the holy dead.

A song for the dead—the awful dead,
With the ruthless eye and the hairless head;
The earthly worm is reveling now
On the joy form and the sunless brow,
Where once beamed joy and love and mirth,
Like glittering stars o'er a darkened earth;
But they have set where the eyeless head
Is pillowed low with the awful dead.

A song for the dead—the mighty dead—
Let the strain be deep as their solemn tread,
As oft they come in their waked dreams,
And their forms are seen in the glassy streams;
And their voice is heard to breathe and chant
Around some old and favorite haunt,
Where yet we hear in the silent tread
And whispering voice—the mighty dead!

THE CHILD'S CORNER.

From Merry's Museum.

"All the same a hundred years hence."

It was one morning, as the hand
Of the clock pointed to ten minutes before nine, that John came running up to his mother with some play-
thing in his hand, exclaiming,
"Mother, have you seen my arithmetic anywhere?"

"Yes, my son; I picked it up from the floor where I suppose you had thrown it, and put it on the table in the library. Have you learned your lesson?"

"No, ma'am; I meant to—but I got skating yesterday, and forgot it."

"Oh, my son," replied his mother,
"that was very heedless; when will you learn that duty comes before pleasure?"

"Never mind, mother," answered
John, in an easy, careless manner,
as he slung his satchel over his shoulder, "it'll be 'all the same a hundred years hence,'" and away
he ran.

His mother sighed as he went away; his easy, unconcerned levity of disposition gave her anxiety and trouble; she feared for his future
character, that it would be wanting in stability and depth and firmness of principle. She was not deceived, as many parents might have been,
by his careless good-nature; for John
was a boy who did not give much trouble; he very rarely quarreled;
he took everything pleasantly, and
was seldom dissatisfied or cross.
But his mother, who understood his character well, saw that this did not arise from real amiability so much as from an inclination to take everything easily, and from a temper insensible to mortification,
ambition, or praise; a temper
which, while it has the outward traits of amiability, is really compatible with great selfishness, and is perhaps more difficult to make an impression upon than any other.

That afternoon John returned very late from school coming in with eyes just as bright, and as happy a look as usual.

"What makes you so late, my
dear?" asked his mother.

"Kept in ma'am," answered John carelessly. "Oh, mother, are we going to have baked apples for supper? I'm hungry as a bear."

"Oh, my dear boy," answered his mother, pained by his tone and taking no notice of his question,
"that is the second time this week.
I am ashamed to have you in disgrace so often."

"When the master told me to stay," replied John, "George color-up like everything; but I didn't mind much; it was warm and comfortable there, and, any way, I'm out now. I'll be 'all the same a hundred years hence.'"

"I hear you say that very often,
John," said his mother, speaking very seriously; "have you ever thought what it means, or whether it is true?"

"Why, mother, I suppose it must be true; we shall all be dead then,
and what difference can it make whether I have learned an arithmetic lesson or have been kept in school?" answered John.

"And does what we do in this world make no difference to us after we are dead, John?" asked his mother, gravely.

"Why, yes, mother; but not such things."

"Yes, my dear boy, just such things—or, rather, the character which leads you to disregard such things," replied his mother. "The same disposition which leads you to care nothing for punishment and disgrace at school, will make you unmindful and careless of God's anger and his punishment of sin;

the same feeling which makes you neglect a lesson, will incline you to neglect any other duty, even the most important. 'At that is faithful in the least, is faithful also in much.' If we do not make conscience of little duties, we shall never do it in great ones. In no sense can it be 'the same a hundred years hence,' whether we neglect or perform a duty, either to ourselves or others."

"Why, mother," said John, in some surprise, "I can see now how it might make a difference to myself, but I am sure I don't see how it can to any one else."

"Suppose," answered his mother,
quietly, "that Sir Isaac Newton
had thought it could make no difference whether he got his lesson in mathematics or not, would it have been all the same a hundred years
from the time he lived? or would it not, on the contrary, have made a vast difference? Suppose that Guttenberg, the inventor of printing, had felt as you do, that it was of no consequence whether he applied himself or not to anything useful,
would the condition of the world
have been the same a hundred years from that time, as it actually was after the invention of printing? What these men did had an influence on almost every nation of the earth,
and in some nations on every individual."

"I never thought of it so," said John.

"And there is a difference far wider still," added his mother, more seriously and tenderly. "A hundred years hence, where will you be?
Either in eternal happiness or eternal misery. As you act now in this life, so will be your eternal destiny. It will not be 'all the same a hundred years hence,' whether you do wrong or right now. Whether you love God and keep his commandments or not. No—it will make an infinite difference; and not only to yourself, but to others, for probably upon your example and words depends the eternal state of some other besides yourself. Begin to act so now that it may be happy
a hundred years hence, both for yourself and for those whom you may influence, that you have lived."—Am. Messenger.

STRIKE THE KNOT!—"Strike the knot!" said a gentleman one day
to his son, who, tired and weary,
was leaning on his ax over a log
which he had in vain been trying to cleave. When looking at the log, the gentleman saw how the boy had hacked and chipped all around the knot without hitting it.
Taking the axe, he struck a few sharp blows on the knot, and split
the log without difficulty. Smiling, he returned the ax to his son, saying
"Always strike the knot!"

That was good advice. It is good for you, my children, as it was for the boy to whom it was first given. It is a capital maxim to follow when you are in trouble.
Have you a hard sum to do at school? Have you got to face a difficulty? Are you leaving home to live for the first time among strangers? Strike the knot! Look your trouble in the eye, as the bold lion
hunter looks in the face of the lion.
Never shrink from a painful duty,
but step right up to it and do it.
Yes, strike the knot! Strike the knot, boys and girls, and you will always conquer your difficulties.

SCIENTIFIC.

FISH-CULTURE.

The artificial propagation and rearing of fish is one of the most interesting and in many situations
one of the easiest and most profitable kinds of husbandry. Experience has rendered it as simple a thing as hatching fowls, and will yet render it, wherever water is available, as common. The pursuit has spread considerably in this country, both among amateurs and economists, particularly in Massachusetts, as our readers are aware.

The improvement effected by human aid in the preservation of the eggs and multiplication of their actual product, is one of the most striking results of man's interference with animal nature. It is supposed that under natural conditions not more than one egg in five thousand of the spawn of fishes ever comes to maturity. But the Canada Farmer informs us that a gentleman of the "Dominion" has obtained from four female salmon, captured last fall in a small stream that empties into Lake Ontario, a progeny of no less than 20,000 to 30,000 young salmon, which are doing finely. As to the parents, indeed, this is doing rather better than could be expected.
Any kind of fish can be thus propagated, by following plain instruction with tolerable care. All that is needed is a safe receptacle or tank, or series of such, through which a pure current (filtered if necessary) is made to pass constantly, but so gently as not to disturb the eggs in the bottom. It should be protected from light by opaque sides and a perforated cover.

The principal care and science are required in obtaining and impreg-nating the eggs, which must be done
from the adult fish at the proper season and in a particular manner, described in such works as Buck-
land on "Fish-hatching."

A species of aquarium by far surpassing any other in curious interest may be maintained within doors
by any one who can command a constant stream of pure water as large as a straw. The most satisfactory arrangement for observing the process of development in the eggs is to place them on a sort of raft of glass rods fixed in a frame of wood, fitting the interior of the tank, and just submerged beneath the surface of the water. The curious stages of transformation will richly repay daily examination with the microscope. The first development, after the egg has been maturing in the proper temperature for about thirty days, exhibits itself in two minute dots, which are the eyes of the young fish. The transparency of the structure enables the fish to be examined at a later stage, coiled up within the envelope, or shell,
when nearly ready to be hatched.
Soon after this it may be caught in the act of emerging from the shell, and it will then present to view a singular structure in which all the embryo organs can be examined by the microscope. For some time after being hatched, they have a transparent, jelly-like appearance,
and the whole organization exhibits itself in an extremely delicate and beautiful condition. The heart, blood vessels, liver and other organs, the gelatinous beginnings of gills, fins and bones, can all be distinctly traced, and although the structure is too frail to bear a touch,
the motions are exceedingly swift.
The most curious thing about them
is a sack, resembling the air sacks
or floats found inside of adult fishes,
which is carried suspended beneath the body but three times its size at first, and is filled with an oily looking fluid, analogous to the yolk of an egg. This supplies the entire nourishment of the young fish for the first six or seven weeks of its existence. In fact, it is simply pursuing in freedom the process of growth and sustenance which land embryos need to undergo in confinement and shelter. As its fish grows, by absorption of the contents of the sack (or haversack) the latter diminishes, and eventually disappears,
when the young creature begins to eat for itself, and takes on in miniature the functions and habits of a fully developed fish. It should not be let out of the breeding tank until this change takes place. —Scientific American.

MISCELLANEOUS.—More home-made
"protection," is advertised by the town of Fayetteville, Vt., which offers a bonus of $5,000 to any one who will invest as much more in a saw or grist mill in that place.

An order was lately received in San Francisco from Japan for $10,000 worth of leather, to be used for military accoutrements. — It is said that Florida produces lemons weighing over a pound, and twelve inches
in circumference, obtained by a cross between the common lemon and the sour orange. — A company is forming in New York, with a capital of $9,000,000, to introduce the cultivation of coffee on a large scale in South Florida. It is proposed to engage about 2,500 laborers.

Over seventy new manufacturing establishments are either just opened
or will soon be opened in Michigan, Illinois and Wisconsin. — A manufactory of fertilizers is to be started at Palmonth, Mass., with a capital of $1,000,000 (?). — A large paper
manufactory is to be erected in Camden, Me. The town has voted to exempt it from taxation for five years.

The new paper companies at Holyoke, Mass. (the Valley and the Riverside) will soon begin operations. — A paper mill has been erected at Golden City, Colorado, which will be turning out paper by the first of June. — There are eleven breweries in Erie, Penn., with an average capacity of 200 barrels per day. — Piqua, O., is to have a flax mill, 80 feet long, 40 feet wide and three stories high. — During the past year ten porgy oil factories
have been erected in Damariscotta,
Me. at a cost of $5,000 each.

A large sugar refinery has just been started in Portland, and another is getting organized in Bath. The great Portland cordage factory is also making progress in subscriptions. — The works at Chatsworth, Ill., have turned out about 100,000 pounds of beet root sugar, during the past season. The machinery was made in Europe, and is very costly. — The manufactory of glass was commenced at La Salle, Ill., in 1865. The sand found in that vicinity is well adapted for glass-making, and two other glass-factories have recently been started there.
The people of La Salle call it the
"Pittsburg of the West." — The Coye-Hill Cheese Company have begun to build a factory in Warren,

which was to commence operations
the first of this month with the milk of 350 cows. — The cheese factory
now going up at Essex, Vt., will be 100 by 32 feet, two stories high, and will cost about $4,000. — The Methuen (Mass.) Woolen Co., propose to erect a new mill during the coming summer. — The preponderance of manufactures in proportion to population in the chief Eastern cities of the Union apparently belongs to Philadelphia, in which city
the yearly product is equal to $240
per head. Next comes Boston $212, and New York third, with $197; although the cheaper suburbs of New York locate a vast portion of the manufacturing industry of the metropolis proper, and if counted, with their population, in the estimate, might give a different turn to the scale. Looking at the gross anou-ments, we find in New York a product of about 160 millions a year, in Philadelphia 136 millions, and in Boston 38 millions. — The first locomotive built in Pittsburgh was turned out a few days ago. It is a magnificent piece of workmanship, and was built for the Panhandle Railroad. The works are now fully under way and will be able to average about one locomotive per week. — *Scientific

— Be True—Be Patient.

The time is coming, and seems to be near at hand, when party spirit
and sectional pride will no longer wear the name or receive the honors which belong to true patriotism.
In the conflicts of passion, the most reckless and unprincipled carry off
the prizes. When the heart of passion has cooled, and men again act from the dictates of reason and the impulses of their better natures
the true patriot is recognized and rewarded, while the demagogue and partisan sink to their proper level.
Good men may bide their time. The fires of passion will burn out—eventually, and then every man and every party will be judged with a righteous judgment. Crime will not be sanctified because the criminal agrees in opinion with the faction that happens to rule. Noble and exalted characters will not be degraded because they have dared to think differently from a temporary majority. The bloody Jeffreys
may carry matters with a high hand
for a season, but the gentle, charitable Ken be will be elevated to a true and enduring fame by the suffrage of posterity. If many of the present prominent actors in our history could look at themselves as they will appear a hundred years hence, they would be amazed. And we might add, there are some who if they could realize that a century hence they would not appear at all upon the historic page, would spare themselves many grotesque and unnatural strainings after a transient and meanly-bought notoriety.

"Truth is omnipotent, and public justice certain." Truth's triumph may be delayed, but it will come;
public justice may slumber or blunder, but its final verdict will be right. He who lives to compare the present with what his eye will see a dozen years hence, will have cause to rejoice in the assurance that men and parties will always come to be estimated in the grand market
of the world's opinion at their proper valuation. Let us be patient, let us be true to our convictions. — San Francisco Spectator.

CASTOR OIL.—A NEGRO BELIEF.—As
strange as it may appear, many of the colored people here cherish the belief that there is a class of physicians who practice "burking," and are addicted to the dissection of live human subjects, for the purpose of manufacturing castor oil, and that for this purpose the doctors prefer bodies with a dark cuticle. This opinion is so firmly impressed on their minds, that no amount of reasoning will remove it, and we know
many of them, particularly juvenile Africans, who will not budge a foot outside their dwellings after dark.
An otherwise intelligent "Topsy," employed by us, describes the modus operandi of these imaginary ghouls, by saying; "Dey steal upon cullud pussions unawares, clap a plaster over dere month to keep them from bollerin', and den drag um away to whar dey lay um on a table and cut up, and den bile um down for ilo." This is a cheerful notion for those invalids who use the oil of the palma christa bean as a cathartic. The Annapolis, Maryland, Republican states that a similar belief prevails among the colored people in that section, and it probably exists elsewhere. How it originated it is impossible to tell. — Washington Star.

FALL COLTS.—The Maine Farmer
thinks Fall colts more desirable than Spring colts. The mares can usually be allowed to rest during the winter, and if well fed can keep the colts in fine condition so that in Spring they will be ready to have the full benefit of the grass, without the risk of being injured by being fed on grain while young.

BLACKWOOD'S EDINBURGH MAGAZINE (Tory.)

These foreign periodicals are regularly
published by us in the same style as heretofore.
Those who know them and who have long subscribed to them, need no reminder; those whom the civil war of the last few years has deprived of their once welcome supply of the best periodical literature, will be glad to have them again within their reach; and those who may never yet have met with them, will assuredly be well pleased to receive accredited reports of the progress of European science and literature.

TERMS FOR 1867.

ATEST FASHIONS.
J. W. BRADLEY'S
DUPLIX ELLIPTICAL
[Or, Double Spring]

SKIRT!
They will not bend or break
the Single Spring, but will preserve their shape and graceful shape when three or four springs are thrown aside as useless—
these are the CHEAPEST.

Each Hoop is made by braiding two springs
edge in edge, forming the STRONG-EST, most FLEXIBLE, and still the LIGHT-
EST Hoop made.
For back, for promenade, or the house, or the theatre, or for crowded assemblies,
grand cars, carriages, etc., they are superior to all others, affording COMFORT TO THE Wearer, with that ELEGANCE OF SHAPE
which is favored with all, and has made this
"DUPLIX ELLIPTIC"
The Standard Skirt of the Fashionable World.
For Sale Everywhere.
Manufactured exclusively by the owners of
the Patent.

WESTER, BRADLEY & CARY,
Chambers, 79 and 81 Beade sts., New York.

CAUTION.
The Duplex Skirt will admit a pin being run
through the centre of each hoop, thereby providing two SPRINGS braided together,
which is the secret of their remarkable
LENGTH and FLEXIBILITY—a combination not possessed by any SINGLE-SPRING
skirt.
The red ink stamp, viz: "J. W. BRADLEY'S Duplex Elliptic Springs," will be found upon waistband of every Skirt; none other are genuine.

RANDOLPH MACON COLLEGE, VA.,
IN FULL OPERATION.
THIS TIME HONORED INSTITUTION is
once more in successful operation, with a FULL CORPS OF PROFESSORS. The chairs of the
several schools are filled by able and experienced men. There are five literary and scientific
schools, viz: OF ANCIENT LANGUAGES,
GHEMISTRY and NATURAL PHILOSOPHY,
MORAL PHILOSOPHY and MODERN LAN-GUAGES. In addition to the above the Board of Trustees have established a school of COM-MERICAL SCIENCE, with the view of giving
to the young men of the country a BUSINESS EDUCATION.
To graduates in all these schools, Diplomas
are granted and the degrees of Bachelor of Arts
and Master of Arts are conferred upon students
who accomplish a certain course. The high
grade of scholarship formerly required is still maintained. We have a full CHEMICAL and PHILOSOPHICAL APPARATUS for the illustration of the subjects taught.
The location of the College is unsurpassed for health and geniality. It is situated midway between the mountains and the seaboard; and
during a career of thirty-three years, and with
thousands of young men in attendance, there
has never been a death arising from malaria or
other local cause. We profess to educate young men not only mentally but physically also.
BOARD IS SIXTEEN DOLLARS PER MONTH. Tuition from $10 to $20, according to the number of books attended. $250 will cover
expenses of board, tickets for three schools,
matriculation and contingent fees for ten months.
It opens in the college free of charge, but the student provides his own furniture, fuel and
lights. Young men who are preparing for the ministry and those desirous of the law who are unable to pay their tuition, will be allowed to attend any or all of the above courses of charge.
This College is situated near Boydton, the
county seat of Mecklenburg county, Va.
Arrangements are made to transport students
from the Raleigh and Weldon Railroad, which terminates at the Richmond and Danville
Railroad, on Mondays, Wednesdays and Fridays,
and the Wolf Trap Depot, on the same road,
Tuesdays, Thursdays and Saturdays.
We solicit a liberal patronage from Maryland,
Virginia and North Carolina, from the West,
South and South-west.
Students will be received at any time. The second term will commence on the 6th day of February next. Young men will be received and prepared for the College proper. For further particulars address the undersigned at Boydton, Mecklenburg county, Va.

BISHOPS.

Mr. Editor: Some of our Church papers are continually harping a little more prominently than others. One would suppose, from the style of the writers, that Bishops had nearly become essential to salvation. I recently read an article in the Nashville Advocate, from the pen of a certain Mr. Duncan, that seems to be written in this strain. He thinks we are greatly deficient in the number of Bishops; and that the Church is suffering for want of them; because many of our members never saw a Bishop; that those who only occasionally see them would be incalculably benefited by more frequent contact with them; that the being made Bishop makes our preachers much greater men and preachers; and that there is so large an amount of Bishop material which needs development, which will, otherwise, never be worth so much to the Church. Truly this looks like magnifying the office considerably. And it is true, should call for immediate attention. I sympathize with Mr. D. in his great concern on this subject, and as our present system is not likely to justify an increase of the Episcopacy sufficient to meet the demand he has created, I think I can suggest a plan that will meet the case precisely; that is, to denominate all the ordained elders of our Church by their apostolic title of Bishop. This would furnish Bishop to almost every circuit and station. All the old ladies and little children would get a chance to see their Bishop! And then the vast improvement that would be made in preaching qualifications! and the multiplication of great men among us! Surely the Church would not hesitate a moment to enter into the measure, especially as it can be done so economically. We have had a great deficiency in the collections for the support of our present Superintendents; and they were multiplied to the extent contemplated by brother D., I fear they would not be supported at all. On the plan suggested all the great benefits would be secured about the addition of a farthing's expense. If my plan is not adopted we must have an increase of Bishops. I would respectfully nominate brother D. in addition to those he has suggested, as none of them could fill a Bishop's chair more competently than he. Yours, &c.

G. SHAFFER.

A STORY WITH A MORAL.

Harper's last monthly has a story about a little girl, the daughter of a republican, who went in company with a friend to visit an uncle who lived at a distance. Arriving late in the day, and being fatigued by a journey, she proposed, to retire early, and requested her friend to accompany her; but the friend replied that she wished to sit up until Uncle David had had prayers. "Prayers!" exclaimed the girl, "Uncle David pray? I thought he was a democrat."

After the laugh is over, there is a moral in the above worthy of a man's thought. How came this unsophisticated creature to think that a democrat did not pray?

become imbued with ideas derived from black republicans. Look at Dr. Wheedon's fling at them, under the title of "Copperheads," when speaking of the extension of the Southern Church into the North, and who could suppose them within the reach of salvation! What child, reading and believing the Christian Advocate and Journal, the Western Christian Advocate, or the Northwestern, could believe that either democrats or Southerners ever prayed, or could be saved? After hearing "Pa" give the reasons why he, or Uncle, "captured" from a wicked lady down South the beautiful silk-dress that neither wears when she goes to the sacrament, and the elegant one which she wore at the Sunday school celebration, when she spoke that beautiful piece about doing to others as she would have them do to her, and brother John spoke the one about the wickedness of stealing, and why he brought home the fine piano on which sister Lucy is taking lessons, what girl capable of reasoning would think any thing but monsters lived in this region? Do they not hear the character and conduct of Southern Christians darkly portrayed when appealed to for missionary money to send them the gospel? What can the children of the republican church think of all who do not belong to that delightful party?

HARD TEXTS.

A writer in the Index, published in Mobile, has come across several passages of Scripture that give him trouble, and he asks for help in their explanation. Several members of the Mobile Conference are in the same condition, and ask for light. We have succeeded in getting pretty well over the difficulties presented by our ordination vows, by calling to mind that though we solemnly pledged ourselves to God and the Church, that we would "give ourselves wholly to this office," and as much as lay in us, we would "apply" ourselves "wholly to this one thing," and also "draw all" our "care and studies" this way," yet that these questions were framed by man, and are not found in this form in the Bible. But here are some texts from the Bible that are as hard, if not harder to dispose of than the questions in the ordination service. And, Mr. Editor, if you can not ease this matter a little, some of us will have to quit farming, trading, etc., and keep our vows. Do what you can for us.

I Kings xix: 20—"And he left the oxen."

Acts vi: 4—"But we will give ourselves continually to prayer, and the ministry of the word."

I Tim. iv: 13-15—"Till I come, give attendance to reading, to exhortation, to doctrine. Neglect not the gift that is in thee, which was given thee by prophecy, with the laying on of the hands of the Presbytery. Meditate upon these things; give thyself wholly to them, that thy profiting may appear to all."

I Tim. ii: 3-5—"Thou, therefore, endure hardness as a good soldier of Jesus Christ. No man that warreth entangleth himself with the affairs of this life; that he may please him who hath chosen him to be a soldier."

I Cor. ii: 2—"For I determined not to know any thing among you, save Jesus Christ, and him crucified."

Gal. i: 16—"I conferred not with flesh and blood."

ARMINIUS.

"A habit of benevolence must be contracted and kept alive, as all other habits are, by constant exercise. Now our daily behavior to our domestics gives us an occasion for an uninterrupted exercise of benevolence; and scarce anything else does. There is not a day passes over our heads but we might contribute something to lessen the uneasiness or promote the happiness of those with whom we have to do; and, by studying to promote their happiness, we mould ourselves into those habits which are productive of our own, both here and hereafter."

THE RAIN.

BY PAUL H. RAINE.

The rain! the desolate rain!
Ceaseless, solemn and chill!
How it drips on the misty pane!
How it drenches the darkened sill!
Of scenes of sorrow and death,
I would that the wind awaking
To a fierce and gusty birth,
Might vary this dull refrain.
Of the rain, the desolate rain!
For the heart of heaven seems breaking
In tears o'er the fallen Earth!
And again, again, again,
We list to the sombre strain—
The long, low, monotonous,
(Whose soul is a mystic moan.)
Of the rain, the rain, the rain!
The low, despairing wail.

BRITISH HONDURAS.

Resolved, 1. That the introduction of agricultural immigrants from the Southern States of America, is a subject deserving the serious consideration of this house, and calls for prompt and decisive action in order that such immigration may be promoted in every way that may be practicable.

Resolved, 2. That in the opinion of this House, immigrants coming to this country with the view of settling amongst us as Farmers and Agriculturists, should be exempted from payment of all imports upon any agricultural implements, stock, furniture, or other personalty they may bring with them or introduce, on giving satisfactory guarantees to the collector and controller of customs, that the owners and introducers of such agricultural implements, stock, furniture, or other personalty, intend to settle in the Colony as farmers or other agriculturists, and that they have no intention of selling or disposing of them, or any of them, for profit.

Resolved, 3. That the House will agree to amend the tariff bill, so as to give effect to the foregoing resolution.

True copy, Resolutions unanimously agreed to, by the Legislative Assembly of British Honduras, on the 19th day of April, 1867.

JOHN BRISTOW,

Clerk to the Legislative Assembly, B. H.

The expense of our family, eight in number, for the first month in Belize, was $100, including $25 for house rent, 5 for servants' wages, and the rest for washing, groceries and marketing. All groceries are brought from the States, and sold here for silver at the same price they are bought in greenbacks. It would be well to bring a supply of groceries, and all necessary articles of household furniture; light furniture, bedding and clothing are best adapted to this warm climate. A cooking stove and necessary tinware would best be bought in the States. Crockery is cheaper here than in New Orleans, but of inferior quality. Dry goods are cheaper here than there.—Mississippian.

Rev. Thos. M. Lynch—Biography.

Died at his residence in Coosa county, Ala., on the 18th of April, 1867, Rev. Thos. M. Lynch, of the Montgomery Conference, aged forty-two years. This excellent man was born in Wilkinson county, Mississippi, but was educated at Mt. Hope, Baltimore, and Emory College; at the latter place he was converted under the teachings of Dr. Mears, the effects of whose influence, was not doubt exhibited in the mental and physical developments of his after life. In 1840 Bro. Lynch was admitted as a member of the Alabama Conference (where his father, the Rev. Thos. Lynch, had long occupied a high position) and appointed to Enou Circuit, next year to Marianna, Florida, next returned to the same place, with Apalachicola attached. In this work his health failed, and feeling unable to do efficient service as an itinerant, he located, and was for some years employed as teacher—at the same time filling the place of chaplain in the penitentiary for three years.

His health in the meantime improving, he was readily re-admitted into the Alabama Conference in 1857, and stationed at Lowndesboro in 1858 and 1859, in 1860 at Oak Hill, in 1861 and 1862 at Prattville. This concluded his active labors, and declining health obliged him to take a superannuated relation after 1863, during which year he was sent, at his own request, to Socopaty Circuit, where his family alliances were. Though unable to take the regular active labors of a minister, he continued preaching until a few months before his death, in many instances yielding to the earnest solicitation of the people to the injury of his health.

Bro. L. was endowed with a mind and faculties of a high order, which, cultivated by education, beautified by reading, and matured by reflection, fitted him eminently for the position of a minister in the higher circles of society; and to these he added a purity of thought, a holiness of heart, and a social bearing at once elegant and refined, which stamped upon his character the insignia of an accomplished Christian gentleman and a divinely eloquent minister. As a minister he was successfully zealous in the clear and convincing expositions of the Scriptures and doctrines of the Church, rebuked and exposed the wickedness of the human heart in pointed arguments and with fearless faithfulness to his commission, and presented truth often with such beauty of conception and towering eloquence that his congregation, with mute admiration and interested seriousness, unconsciously followed him through the creative beauties of his inspired imagination. But if he was an able minister of the New Testament, widely known and highly appreciated in the whole circle of his labors, not less did the lustre of his character beam in the patient performance of pastoral duties, and with undiminished radiance imparted a rich halo of welcoming smiles around his presence in the social circle; yes, in that inner circle where man communes more fully and freely with his fellow, and where the graces and elegancies of polished character are exhibited in fine conversational powers, soft affable manners, a highly cultivated taste, the whole controlled by a sweet Christian spirit—these characteristics pre-eminently distinguished the life of this good man.

In 1849, he was married to Miss Annie V. Allen, who was truly his companion and partaker of his labors, and as a ministering angel watched over him in his decline.

In his domestic relations, where his virtues shone in their full lustre as husband and father, he occupied a high position, dispensing a holy influence in his teachings around the family altar and fireside, and with prompt and generous nobleness extended the hospitalities of his household to his friends and to strangers, thereby impressing all with the noble frankness of his heart and desire to make them happy.

But with all his endearments of character, and usefulness as a minister and man, his Master has seen fit in His divine wisdom to take him away in middle life, leaving behind him, to battle with the ills of life and adversities of the times, a wife and six children. The strength and vigor of his manhood was given to the Church to which, under the protection of the Great Shepherd, he with confidence confided them; little innocents they must tread the thorny pathway of life—too soon to realize the sad fact that the father, who was wont to direct their steps and lead them safely along the dangerous path of life, has been called away and comes not back nor returns at the hour "when the gentle good-nights are repeated."

Bro. Lynch, in his death, attested the truth of the Christianity he had preached and practiced—his preparations were fully made, there was no confusion, no doubt or uncertainty, but depending fully upon the promises of his blessed Saviour, in communion with his pious and devoted wife he assured her that all was well. Truly in his life and death is illustrated that beautiful Scripture, "the work of righteousness shall be peace, and the effect of righteousness quietness and assurance forever."

This humble tribute to his worth is by one who for many years had the pleasure of his friendship and intimacy in a special manner, enjoyed the high privilege of sitting under his ministering teachings, and who feels in this respect "that though he be dead, yet he speaketh."

G.

PUBLIC SCHOOL STATISTICS.—The whole number of teachers employed in the public schools of New Orleans is 253, and they are divided in the following manner: In the high schools there are two male principals, six male assistants, and nine female assistants; in the district schools there are fifteen male principals, twenty-two female principals, six male first assistants, thirty-four female first assistants, fifty-eight female second assistants, and ninety-nine female third assistants—in all making twenty-nine male teachers and two hundred and twenty-four female teachers.

The average attendance of pupils in the high schools of New Orleans, during the year closing with December 31, 1866, was 327; the whole number on register, 446.

The average attendance during the same year in the schools of the First District was 3917; whole number on register, 5710. In the Second District, the average attendance was 2630; whole number on the register, 3313. In the Third District, the average attendance was 3120; whole number on register, 3732. In the Fourth District, the average attendance was 1918; whole number on register, 2590. Total average attendance, 11,920—total whole number on register, 15,791.

The average attendance of pupils during the quarter ending March 31, 1867, in the high schools, has been 366—whole number enrolled, 394. In the schools of the First District during same quarter, the average attendance has been 4377—whole number enrolled, 5940. In the Second District, the average attendance has been 3058—whole number enrolled, 3737. In the Third District, the average attendance has been 3419—whole number enrolled, 4250. In the Fourth District, the average attendance has been 2142—whole number enrolled, 2756. Total average attendance, 13,362—whole number enrolled, 17,077.

General average of the number of pupils to each teacher last year, exclusive of high schools, was 495. The average of the cost, same year, of each pupil, exclusive of interest on valuation of school-houses owned by the city, was 21-10.

The total amount of disbursements on account of public schools, for the year closing December 31, 1866, was $253,542 49. Of this amount, $196,340 48 was paid for salaries of teachers; for books and stationery, $16,043 43; for wages of porters having charge of school-houses, $11,408 50; and for rents of school-houses and school-house repairs, $12,682 39.

The total amount of disbursements on account of public schools, for the quarter closing March 31, 1867, was $81,480 03.

Under an act of the Legislature, the public schools of the city are represented in the State Institution at Alexandria by masters Heman J. Packard, John Henry Lanau, J. J. Hoffman, and Henry Guish.

We have collated these statistics from the annual report of the Board of School Directors recently submitted to the Common Council of New Orleans. This report is certainly a very interesting document. The public schools of New Orleans are its pride and glory; and in this connection we can not refrain from extracting the following paragraphs from the able report of Superintendent Rogers:

"Our public school system has been established upon a liberal and comprehensive basis. There may be defects, but these can be removed by patient labor and wise legislation. As long as knowledge is superior to ignorance, and virtue is more to be esteemed than vice; as long as the results of intelligence are more efficient than the toil of brute force; as long as the State can point with pride and hope to the children she has nourished—so long will the cause of education claim a large share of public attention. Public institutions possess some important advantages as compared with private enterprise. Among these are economy in the use of means, elaboration of details and adjustments of parts to constitute a complete system, ability to secure and preserve the most successful agencies, the stimulus of emulation as furnished by numbers.

"Then, the results aimed at are general—to bestow the greatest good upon the greatest numbers—to diffuse the means of usefulness through all the avenues of society, that the children of the rich and the poor may find equal incentives to honorable activity."

THE AFRICAN M. E. CHURCH—ITS POLITICS.—A large meeting of the members of the conferences now in session in the city, and numbers of pastors of various denominations, was held last evening at S. James' church, Roman street, to take into consideration the duties of the pastors of the various churches to the people; at the time when the interests of their race were so deeply involved. Rev. Bishop Campbell, of the A. M. E. Church, made an earnest and eloquent appeal, urging on the pastors the necessity of instructing the members of their churches and others to unite in supporting the Republican party, and to co-operate with those who have been the friends of the colored people. This was no time to divide the votes of the colored men, as they are not yet free, in fact, nor will be until the laws were changed, and a new constitution securing to them all those rights, was framed and legally endorsed by the votes of the people. And this cannot be done by the people of Louisiana alone, but it must be accomplished in all the seceding States, and then be represented in Congress. This is the essential step. The highest interests of the colored race—demand cordial union not only with each other, but with all their Republican Union friends.

General S. L. Brown, Nathaniel Paige, Rev. J. D. Smith and Oscar Dunn afterwards addressed the meeting appropriately, urging close union of all the friends of reconstruction under the plan proposed by Congress. The Republican party is not strong enough to secure success if divided; but united it is bound to be triumphant.—Republican.

The gospel is "a word in season to him that is weary;" therefore it speaks only to him that is weary, to him that is seeking rest and finding none; and to him it brings relief, refreshment and repose. It finds you a bristled reed; it props and supports you. It finds you a weeper, and it wipes away all tears from your eyes. It finds you fearful, cheerless, disquieted, and it gives you courage, hope and tranquillity. There is a wilderness before her, and the garden of Eden is behind her; "languidation, and mourning, and sorrow" behind her, and "the joy of the Lord" before her.

EPISCOPAL ADDRESS.

TO THE MINISTERS AND MEMBERS OF THE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH, SOUTH.

Beloved Brethren:—Grace be unto you, and peace, from God the Father, and from our Lord Jesus Christ.

On making up and comparing our reports from the several Conferences for the past, and publishing the Plan of Episcopal Visitation for the coming year, we deem it proper, under the circumstances, to address you a special message of counsel, of warning, and of encouragement.

A survey of the condition of the Churches under our care fills us with gratitude and hope. By the blessing of God we have been able to attend the regular sessions of all the Annual Conferences. We have witnessed the reorganization of every department of the Church—missionary, publishing, educational, and benevolent—and the re-occupation of every field in which there had been a temporary suspension of operations. Houses of worship, which had been burned down or damaged, have been rebuilt or repaired; and this work goes on. In their deep poverty our people have not ceased to call for pastors, and the preached word, and the ordinances; and pastors have been supplied them, though often with divided labor and meager sustenance. Indeed, our lines have been extended, and we now cover more territory, number more Conferences, station more preachers, and have a wider jurisdiction, than at any former time.

Our Conference sessions have been of unusual interest to the communities where they were held; and the gracious influences upon preachers and people gave assurance of the presence of the Holy Spirit in our assemblies. Returns from circuits, stations, and missions, show that the Lord still bears testimony to the word of his grace, and many thousand souls have been converted and added to the Church.

Nearly everywhere we are met by the complaint of lessened means and straitened resources. Beware, brethren, lest this become a snare and a sin to you, in being pleaded against God's just claims. Beware, lest this fact, in some cases rather apparent than real, be abused as a cloak of covetousness. A little that a righteous man hath can go a great way in well-doing. The poor have their obligations, and our Master accepts their offerings. A poor Church may be a very strong one. The gifts upon God's altar have always been in proportion to the piety, rather than the possessions, of his people.

The general and unprecedented dearth which has prevailed over large portions of our country, has given occasion for the liberality of our people in more favored circumstances, which we note with pleasure as a genuine fruit of Christianity. The administration of this service not only supplieth the wants of the suffering among us, but is abundant, also, by many thanksgivings unto God. We earnestly desire the manifestation of this grace in you, yet more and more.

The two questions sent down from the General Conference to the Annual Conferences have been submitted by us to all of them, with the following results:

For concurrence with the motion to change the style and title of the Church, 1,168 votes were cast; against it, 409. The affirmative vote being less than the required three-fourths of the members present and voting, the motion fails.

For concurrence with the motion to introduce lay-representation into the Annual and General Conferences, 1,199 votes were cast; against it, 371. The required three-fourths having been given, this motion prevails. Lay-representation, therefore, according to the plan submitted and approved, becomes a part of the organic law of the Church.

Whether or not these questions be in their nature constitutional, and subject to the restrictive rules, we think it well that the Church, with singular unanimity, has consented so to regard them. A conservative temper has been shown in refraining from the adoption of important alterations by mere majorities. They were submitted to the severe ordeal of two-thirds vote of the General Conference, and the concurrence of a three-fourths vote in the Annual Conferences. It is an augury for good when the rights and feelings of minorities are thus respected. A delicate regard to constitutional limitations, a jealousy of hasty and impulsive measures, should be cherished. Let those whose wishes have been defeated accept gracefully this result of checks and delays, which are our best earthly safeguards against untimely, unwise, and impracticable legislation.

We may be allowed to call attention to some features of this accomplished fact. It is seldom, if ever, paralleled in the kingdoms of this world that men holding power should, on their own motion, and without any clamor or pressure from without, call in their brethren to share it with them. On account of the circumstances then existing, our Church was organized in America with the utmost simplicity, and more in view of efficiency than of any nice theories of human government. Our fathers gave little heed, as do their sons, to temporal analogies and political conformities, knowing that the kingdoms of this world are worked in a different spirit, contemplate different objects, and at their best estate are not models for Christ's kingdom. Following the example, and using the liberty of the apostolic and primitive Church, they did what we propose to do—adapted, within certain limits, the best means to the end. In all their rules and regulations a reverent regard was had to our 22d Article, which is not ours only, but, in form or substance, the creed of the Christian world; "It is not necessary that rites and ceremonies should in all places be the same, or exactly alike; for they have been always different, and may be changed according to the diversity of countries, times, and men's manners, so that nothing be ordained against God's word." Ordaining, changing, and abolishing, within these limits, is lawful for "every particular Church," "so that all things may be done to edification."

Our Church, under the blessing of its Divine Head, has spread abroad into twenty-nine Annual Conferences, and taken on a breadth of evangelical enterprise. For years, more or less informally, her sense of need and propriety has been evincing itself in the effort to bring the laity into co-operation with the ministry in carrying forward this enlarged work, maintaining the subsidiary interests which have gathered about her, and in meeting the weighty responsibilities and multifarious cares of the household of faith. The mind of the Church has been long maturing to the present conclusion. Hence, the consent and quietness with which this so important measure has been inaugurated.

Now upon the laity will largely rest the responsibility of working it. Brethren, show your zeal for the Lord's house by leaving your farms, your shops, your merchandise, your offices, and other employments, to attend the Annual and General Conferences. We need not urge upon you the duty of appointing, as representatives, men proved and tried, large-minded and large-hearted, and who will count it no hardship to devote the time and travel necessary to the discharge of representative functions. Make a conscience of this matter. Let there be a pause in the too eager pursuit of wealth and worldly honor. Covet an honorable distinction in the service of the Church, which has a claim on the best talent, and is a field where true glory and immortality may be won.

The General Conference enacted a rule for promoting the religious interests of the freedmen, concerning which we would say, that after a year's observation and partial trial, it seems to be the best for doing whatever we can do for this people. Beyond it we have no other advice to give than is suggested by their moral relations to us and to the gospel of our common salvation. We refer you to sec. 5, chap. 3, of Discipline:

"Question. What shall be done to promote the Religious Interests of the Colored People?"

"Answer 1. Let our colored members be organized as separate pastoral charges, wherever they prefer it, and their numbers may justify it."

"2. Let each pastoral charge of colored members have its own Quarterly Conference, composed of official members, as provided in the Discipline," etc.

Farther provisions are given for an ecclesiastical organism among them, as occasion may require, in the development of which nothing is to be forced, nothing restrained. We are to do our duty, and follow the openings of Providence.

Our design is to continue, in the course here laid down. Some progress has been made. In the matters of time and literary qualification for orders, the case of colored preachers, instead of being held to a fixed standard, is considerably left to the discretion of the Annual Conference, to which application for election is made.

Under the operation of this rule we have obtained a "goodly number of deacons and elders, and we have favorable reports of their steadfastness and usefulness as pastors. The disposition at one time manifested by our colored membership to alienation from us, has shown symptoms of a reaction, and in several places they are returning to our pastoral care; in many, they have never withdrawn from it. We have no pecuniary inducements to offer them, no delusive social theories, but simply that gospel and Christian sympathy and moral discipline which have heretofore been so blessed to us and them.

In this connection we call your attention to Report No. 1, on the same subject, adopted by the General Conference, and published in its Journal:

"Whereas, the condition of the colored people of the South is now essentially changed; and whereas, the interests of the white and colored people are materially dependent upon the intelligence and virtue of this race, that we have had, and must continue to have, among us; and whereas, the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, has always claimed to be the friend of that people, a claim vindicated by the continuous and successful exertions made in their behalf, in instructing and evangelizing them; and it is important that we should continue to evince our interest for them in this regard; and as our hearts prompt us to this philanthropy; therefore,

"Resolved, That we recommend to our people the establishment of day-schools, under proper regulations and trustworthy teachers, for their children."

This resolution, in spirit, requires what we trust every one of you will be forward to do—the moral as well as material support of such schools and teachers as it describes. We must not wait for public opinion to form itself right on this subject, but contribute to its formation. Any thing like the ostracism of those honestly engaged in this work is a violation of this pledge to each other, to the colored people, and to God. For moral incendiaries and political propagandists, who abuse school-teaching to other purposes, this resolution challenges no sympathy; but so far as we may prevent it, let no man or woman be treated with less respect, or be thought the less of, merely because he or she teaches a negro school. Against such a prejudice, from whatever source arising, let us make common cause with them.

While we congratulate you on signs of a more intimate and visible union with us of other ecclesiastical organizations holding the same doctrines, we regret not to be able to announce the manifestation of a more friendly spirit on the part of the Northern Methodist Episcopal Church. We are constrained to protest against the conduct of that body, which seems to be influenced by the passions of the hour. By appeal to the civil authorities, several of our Church properties taken possession of and persistently held by its agents, have been restored to us; but not all. In these cases we wait patiently the law's delay, while our pastors and people are out of doors, worshipping in private houses, or indebted to the courtesy of sister denominations. Northern Methodist missionaries are sent, not to neglected places, but where our congregations abound, and where the doctrines of Methodism are fully preached according to the standards once held in common with us by the Church which sends them. The object of these intrusionists, therefore, if they preach Methodist doctrines only, is schism; if they bring a new gospel, it is heresy. In some communities they have succeeded in misleading ignorant and unstable persons by cries of "the old Church," and the hardly disguised threat that those who abide with us will draw on themselves confiscation and civil disabilities—all which evils are to be escaped by alliance with them! By an open and shocking prostitution to political partisanship, they have found a doubtful foothold among some who are ready to use a Church or any other instrument for the furtherance of their purposes.

Very generally our ministers are being instructed in the hard lesson—to suffer need. They are giving the gospel to the people in the same spirit of faith that animated our apostolic exclaimers, who, though cast down, were not destroyed; perplexed, they were never in despair. Instances have been brought to our knowledge recently, in nearly every Conference, of great privations cheerfully borne. Brethren of the ministry, if any do complain and are ready to faint under these things, remember your vows. Have we really given up all for Christ? Do we comprehend this matter of consecration? Are we willing to live poor for Christ's sake? Or do we make it a condition of our fidelity that we must be well-housed, well-dressed and well-fed? Is making sacrifices merely a theme for sermons? Or if we have them to make, do we murmur and repine about it? Do we not take great delight in dwelling upon our sacrifices, and even exaggerating them? The sacrifice is never complete while we either make it reluctantly or make a merit of it.

So far as we can see, the burden of the great Methodist work in America is upon us. We are to attain ambition and endure hardness. We are to do God's work as a Church, we have nothing to do but God's work. Original Methodism proposed to itself this only—to spread Scriptural holiness over the earth. When ever Churches, as such, begin to dabble in politics, they become deeply tainted.

When Synods, or Councils or Conferences, pass resolutions in favor of the President against Congress, or vice versa, they are already far gone from God. No wonder, after this, if they should become so unscrupulous as to ask and demand that the parties they have helped to power should reward them with special favors, even to the robbery of others. This deadness of conscience, this greed of power and property, all result naturally from the first false step. This sin and shame of Popery should be confined to Popery alone.

Men of all political opinions have a right to hear God's word at your mouth, and to share in your kind and pastoral care, without being rebuked, directly or indirectly, except for their sins, in determining which God's word is to be your only guide and authority.

The Methodist Episcopal Church, South, is a witness for the Bible as the only and sufficient rule of faith and practice. Her entire history is an assertion of this fact. Her existence has just this meaning—The Bible is the infallible standard of morals, as it is the exclusive rule of faith. Against every system of philanthropy that effects a higher spirit of beneficence than that taught in the Scriptures, our Church inflexibly replies—The Bible is true; the social morality of the Bible is pure; to pretend any thing better is arrogant impiety.

Church-meetings are compacting the membership and reviving discipline. This is no time to abate our testimony again worldliness in all its forms. Our Church has never faltered in its teaching or modified its tone in relation to dancing, theaters, the manufacture and sale of ardent spirits, drunkenness, revelings, and such like, as demoralizing and fatal to godliness. Now, that we are threatened with these evils, coming in like a flood, we renew our warning.

Class-meetings are still attended with their ancient testimony of blessing. The late rule of the General Conference concerning this means of grace, deprived it of none of its edifying power. We exhort preachers and people everywhere to attend them, and if in any locality class-meetings have fallen into desuetude, to use every effort for their revival.

Though the General Conference has not formally introduced District-meetings into our economy, they seem like other prudential regulations which have proved advantageous; to be providentially developing to meet the wants and demands of the Church. Methodism is a conational system. Stations, circuits, and missions must be taught that however distinct, they are parts of a common whole. District-meetings furnish opportunities of singular advantage for counsel and concerted action in regard to finance, the management of Sunday-schools, the circulation of Church literature, education, administration of discipline, and the like; and also, as has been prospectively provided in several of the Conferences, for the appointment of lay-representatives.

To all who set a proper estimate on experimental religion and the communion of saints, the love-feast is held and will be a delight: the love-feast held—not as the manner of some is, but, as our rules direct, with closed doors, to which, besides members, serious persons only are admitted by the pastor.

We would lay a solemn charge upon all administrators of discipline to come back to it, in every particular wherein a lax usage may have obtained.

Insist on a family altar in every house. No substitute has ever been found for family religion. Finally, brethren, remember that rules and regulations, however wise, avail nothing in themselves, "but a new creature." We caution you against substituting the means for the end. This also we wish, even your perfection. Pastors and teachers are given for the perfecting of the saints, for the work of the ministry, for the edifying of the body of Christ, till we all come in the unity of the faith and of the knowledge of the Son of God into a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ.

We propose that Friday, 16th of August next, be observed in all our churches as a day of fasting, humiliation, and prayer—that God would be pleased to pour out his Spirit upon us and upon all flesh; that he would show us our sins and help us, by a true repentance, to turn away from them; that he would send forth laborers into his harvest, who may serve him more faithfully and efficiently than we have done; that he would build up the Church and comfort her waste places; that he would grant us all those blessings, temporal and spiritual, we have need of. And we farther propose that this day of special fasting and prayer be preceded, wherever practicable, by religious exercises begun on the previous Sabbath and continued day by day till the Sabbath following.

And now, brethren, we commend you to God and to the word of his grace, which is able to build you up, and to give you an inheritance among all them which are sanctified.

"ON DUTY."—A Northern Methodist paper, the Northeastern Christian Advocate, published at Chicago, and dated April 17th, in giving some account of the session of the New York Annual Conference, which session was opened in the city of New York, April 3d, says:

"Rev. Bro. Johnson, of Missouri Conference, was introduced. In his remarks he read a letter from Gov. Fitcher saying, 'The Methodists of the North are always on duty. I rely on them more than on my militia.'"

That is decidedly rich. But the Governor of this State is certainly one of the most unfortunate men of the times. He is perpetually going from one mistake into another, and the history of all the States in the once United States might perhaps be searched in vain to find a man acting as Governor who had in the same length of time made so many and such grievous mistakes. His militia operations were great mistakes. So of the railroad matters, and so of divers other matters "too tedious to mention," and now he has made another mistake. He will find it out ere long. The "Methodists of the North" won't do to rely on. True, they may be as vindictive, fanatical and treacherous as were his militia, and they may even cause more mischief for a time, but he had better not rely on them so implicitly. A while ago they were for taking our church houses as a matter of right, then anon they were only taking them as a matter of expediency, and did not intend to keep them, and now they seem almost ready to proclaim they never took them at all.

The Governor relies on these people now more than on his militia—no high compliment to their piety, by-the-by—but sooner or later they will slip from under him, and then, the last prop being removed, "the last link broken," what is to follow?

But in what sense did the Governor use the phrase, "I rely on them more than on my militia?" Does he rely on them to do the praying, or the fighting, or the railroad selling, or the plundering, or the political trickstering? Which is it? He appointed one of those preachers to sell a railroad, several others to register voters, and others again to other positions. Does he rely on them for some particular thing or things, or does he just rely on them for anything and everything? Who can tell?

But seriously, in what a humiliating attitude this Governor and these ecclesiastics are placing themselves? It is a shame!—St. Louis Christian Advocate.

MONTE, May 14.—A large number of negroes met to-night, on the corner of Royal and Government St., to hear Judge Kelly, of Pennsylvania. A number of whites, also, were present. Everything was remarkably quiet until Kelly began speaking. He began by saying he had come to discuss the rights of the negroes—rights they were entitled to, and bid defiance to all interrupters and to the world. He had the 15th Regiment at his back, and if that proved inadequate, the whole United States army would. Judge Kelly continued in this strain for some minutes, using some language and expressing incendiary sentiments which were calculated to incite riotous demonstrations.

He was interrupted by a white man on the outskirts of the crowd, whom the police promptly arrested. The first shot was at this time fired. It is impossible to say by whom. Instantaneously shots followed from negroes, who were all well armed. The firing then became general. Immediately after the firing began the alarm bell rung and continued ringing during the progress of the riot, which lasted an hour. A large majority of the shots were fired by negroes, as but very few of the whites present were armed, having attended the meeting to listen quietly to Kelly, and without the intention of provoking a riot.

The police succeeded in quelling the riot before the arrival of the 15th Regiment, which were ordered out by Col. Shepherd, and appeared on the ground as soon as possible, but not until the meeting had been dispersed. They now guard the streets—everything is quiet, and little or no excitement at midnight.

It is impossible to say positively the number killed and wounded. Three men are known to be killed, two of them negroes, and a number wounded; among them one policeman and a white boy. Kelly is at the Battle House, and leaves for Montgomery to-morrow.

MONTE, May 15.—During the melee last night, the following persons were killed and wounded: Killed, white—Gabriel Alsen; colored, Samuel Brittan.

Wounded, whites—Thomas H. Hard, David Parsons (police), and two boys—James Burns, colored, and S. Sedgwick, white—and Goldsmith J. Gaston, son, and Pierce Mitchell, colored. There was a number of persons slightly injured whose names are unknown.

The two papers of the parish of St. Martinville have been merged into one, the Democrat sinking name and the Courier of the fact being the patronymic of the fusion. The following is a portion of a salubrious:

"In entering up in this new of its existence, the 'Courier of Teche' will throw off the shackles of old party ties and lends, it let the 'dead past' bury its dead with all its traits as well as its errors it will go forth, untrammelled by any of its past alliances and divisions, determined to maintain, throughout the revolutionary crisis which is now agitating country, the principles of a firm and manly independence. But it is not improper to explain that by independence is meant Caucasian independence, in no distinction with negro depravity, lawlessness and misrule. Thus, therefore, it is proposed that 'Courier' will be strictly independent, and no further, for, it can or compromise with monarchism and Sumnerism, even to save country from total wreck. Believing as it does, that it were better that the whole of this nation, which is compromised by the Potomac and the Gulf of Mexico should at once be visited by the of heaven and annihilated, than that the slow, but sure element of destruction should be introduced among our people, in the repulsive shape of the amalgamation and deterioration of the races. The of the Teche, therefore, will be essentially and uncompromisingly white paper."—N. O. Times.

STORM OF THE 5th and 6th.—Officers of the steamer A. G. from Fort Jackson, report having experienced a very heavy gale the 5th and 6th inst., in the below the city, which lasted six hours. The back-water in the bay rose several feet, over the soldiers' quarters at St. Philip, and entering the buildings. Four feet of water reported in the powder magazine. The hospital buildings at Fortson are considerably damaged, roof being partly blown off. A flagstaff inside the fort is down, and there is back water all over the quarters.

At Buras Settlement the levee are broken; also at Mrs. H. Smith's and Dr. Westerfield's. United States survey schooner blown ashore near Mrs. Johnson's landing; there is a break there at Bernard's Landing; the levee has washed away at Captain Brard's, and the water is running the levee. A crevasse occurred at Tropical Bend, below the place of Alfred Ruiz, and several buildings are in the water. The orange and rice crops in the vicinity are proverbially ruined. The levees all along Buras Settlement are in great distress.

The levees are also broken at Blanchmones and Bellevue plantations, and at Petit Prairie. The water is running over the levee at Point Michel, and there is a crevasse at Richland, fifty miles from the city, about 300 yards in width with all the old and new levees gone.

The people along the lower coast require immediate assistance from the Board of Levee Commissioners, if that body has any means at its disposal.—N. O. Times.

THE LONDON CONTEMPORARY publishes some remarkable statistics exposing the imbecility and mismanagement of the English authorities in both before and during the famine, puts in contrast therewith the wisdom and activity evinced by the Christian mission, both English and American, in doing the little that was done, to avert the calamity and to lessen its consequences. The greatness of the occasion is the single fact, that two millions of half of people in the one province of Ohio perished in 1866, from starvation and disease, owing their origin and continuance to a lack of food. We are told that in misadventures, in the latter part of the year, warning of what was likely to be, and in conjunction with foreign philanthropists, that depots of rice should be sent and grain be largely imported into America. It is said that the government told them to mind their own business, any rate nothing was done.

DOGS AND SHEEP.—The Commission of Agriculture was that according to returns from 413 counties, 73,601 have been killed by dogs within the year, of the value of $331,609; the Ohio from 1858 to 1863 inclusive, $704,758, and that 3,936,812 sheep Ohio gave an annual loss of $117,448, 32,695,796 sheep in the northern States would suffer an annual loss of $978,516.

THE N. O. Christian Advocate. SUNDAY SCHOOL CELEBRATION At Whistler, Alabama.

Mr. Editor:—Having heard and read a good deal, recently, about the rapidly growing town, and learning further that there was to be a Sunday-school celebration at the Methodist Church on the 1st of May, I thought that this was a good opportunity to ascertain if the moral improvement of the place was keeping pace with the external improvement—so I attended the celebration. Whistler is located in the Mobile & Ohio Railroad, five miles from Mobile, and is probably one of the most flourishing little places now in the South. The shop on the road is located here—it is a mammoth affair—the company pay about forty thousand dollars per month to the mechanics employed at this point—this forms the basis of the town. The inhabitants number two thousand or more, and the population is still increasing.

During the short time the present celebration has been here, the membership has increased thirty per cent., and the Sunday-school has more than doubled its numbers. Well, the 1st of May has come—it is a very morning, rather cool, but it will be very pleasant after the sun gets a little.

At an early hour there are groups of children hurrying to the church with their parents and friends to assemble, and by ten o'clock the house is crowded. Let us walk in and take a seat, if we get one, which is doubtful—no, here is a gentleman tendering us a seat—I wonder who he is. "That our pastor." Oh how beautifully the church is decorated—some one knows what flowers were made for. But look! what a group of lovely children—about one hundred. There, the little bell rings—no, it is quiet. Who is that on the platform? O, yes, I see now, it is Mr. Carver, the superintendent—with programme in hand. "The exercises will open with song by the school and prayer by our pastor." The song is finished, the prayer is offered, and the programme goes with a dialogue, rendered by two Misses, about Sunday-school celebrations, in which are many important points brought out, showing that the author knew something about Sunday-schools, and Sunday-school celebrations.

I wonder who wrote that." I think I can guess, but the question is not addressed to me, so I will not answer it. The programme consisted of dialogues and well selected pieces of prose and poetry, interspersed with appropriate songs. The dialogues were written and arranged for the occasion, and were quite with good-humored attacks upon the prevailing follies of the age; the object being to point out some great moral truth. The music was all very good—it was vocal music entirely, for they have no instrument. What is more thrilling than the silvery voices of a group of children flowing through the air in liquid song? Beautiful, indeed, was the caroling of that infant class who sang that sweet little song, "I want to be an angel." The exercises closed with that touching piece of poetry, "I have no Mother now," repeated by a little orphan boy who threw a pathos into it that moved almost every one in the audience to tears. The exhibition was a decided success, and will long be remembered as an era in the history of Whistler—not only as an expression of the exquisite taste of the officers of the school, but as demonstrating the refining and elevating influence of religion, calling like gentle dew upon the tender buds of the infant heart, making them to open to the Sun of righteousness, and filling the earth with the sweet fragrance of early piety. After the exercises were closed, the school formed a procession—the citizens present following in the rear—then, "away, away to the woods" we went. The grove that had been selected was about a mile from the church—a beautiful elevation, crowned with live oaks, beech, and magnolia trees—a lovely and inviting spot. There they found a table covered with good things prepared by the ladies for this grand occasion. After dinner all were left to choose their own innocent amusement—some gathered in groups and held a tete-a-tete, others wandered in search of flowers, while the little folks called on the pastor and superintendent to make amusements for them, which duty they performed to their entire satisfaction, until some constructed a swing. As the sun retired and the shadows of night came on apace, every one walked slowly homeward, thanking God, we trust, for the happy day.

SUNDAY SCHOOL CELEBRATION
At Brookhaven, Mississippi.

Mr. Editor:—Friday and Saturday, the 9th and 10th of May, were bright and joyous days to the children at Brookhaven. The sounds of preparation had for several days been heard. Little feet had been heard pattering along our sidewalks, and little voices singing and rehearsing daily in the church. Public expectation was on tiptoe, when on Friday afternoon the bell rang forth its merry peal, the doors of the church were opened, and the seats thronged with happy children and delighted friends. The stage had been handsomely bedecked with flowers and evergreens, arranged in beautiful arches and graceful festoons. The elevated platform was made to represent a spring forest scene—the little girls and blooming young ladies of the school being so arranged as to appear like beautiful nymphs resting beneath the shade of the trees.

—And when music arose with its voluptuous swell,
Bright eyes looked love to eyes which spoke again,
And all went merry as a marriage bell."

Then came the speeches, dialogues, and tableaux, interspersed with beautiful and appropriate songs arranged for the occasion. Where all did well comparisons would be invidious. At night the tableaux representing Bible scenes were exhibited with fine effect. Rebecca and her maidens at the well, with gallant young Jacob on his knee, courting the favor of the Belle of Mesopotamia, was received with rapturous applause, the audience demanding its repetition.

The Angel Scene and the "Holy Mother" carried us away to Bethle-hem's crowded city and to Judea's night-crowned hills, where the heavenly embassy shouted to the shepherds, the "glad tidings of great joy"—the birth of Israel's King and the world's Redeemer. The scene of the poor out-cast, bondswoman, and her son perishing in the wilderness, drew the tear of sympathy from the eyes of many.

But I dare not go further into detail. The whole was a complete success, the children all reflecting credit alike upon their parents and instructors. The exercises concluded at ten o'clock P. M. by the adoption of a resolution of thanks to Bro. J. W. Martin, our faithful superintendent, and to the teachers of the Sabbath-school, not only for their evening's entertainment, but for their successful labors in instructing the children of Brookhaven. A collection was attempted at the close, but owing to a misapprehension of its object, only a very small amount was raised.

The next day was devoted to a grand picnic in a beautiful grove near by. The table, eighty feet in length, groined beneath the weight of luxuries. One hundred and fifty children, our Sabbath-school scholars, stood around the board, while their elders waited and enjoyed the scene. Three hundred little hands and half as many little mouths were soon busy, and the "goodies" rapidly disappeared, to be replaced by as many more from the capacious baskets of their parents and friends. Dinner over with the little folks, the table was rearranged and a bounteous repast spread for the large crowd of friends present.

Their was "enough for each—enough for every one." Nothing disagreeable occurred to mar the pleasure of the occasion. There was but one thing to be regretted—the absence of our excellent and beloved superintendent, Dr. Martin, who being completely prostrated with an attack of sick-head-ache, was unable to be present at the Saturday's festivities.

After dinner appropriate games for the children were inaugurated, and the afternoon was spent in frolic and merriment.

Now, Mr. Editor, don't you rejoice with those that rejoice? I have carefully refrained from boasting, but I do think it is but justice to say that we have a number one Sabbath-school: one of the best, perhaps, in the Conference. It is well organized, well conducted, largely attended, and highly appreciated, and all this is due, under the blessing of God, to the exertions of our brother, Dr. J. W. Martin.

Truly yours,
L. R. REMING, Pastor.

UNTHRIFT OF TIME.

One very often finds that the people who are most thrifty in affairs of money are guilty of the most habitual unthrift in the husbanding and disposal of time. Thrift may be said to consist in getting money's worth for money spent. The same virtue may plainly exist in connection with time. Money for which you fail to get some due equivalent is in so far wasted. Lapse of time which brings you nothing is wasted in the same sense. Fools allow their money, or some of it, to slip through their fingers without getting a morsel of good out of it. And time, too, is thus allowed to slip away without being forced to surrender some advantage, not by fools only, but by a good many who pass for wise folk, and who in truth are rather wise. The students at St. Andrews were recently warned, not how short life is, but "how much shorter we make it by the time we waste on things which are neither business, nor meditation, nor pleasure." It is really startling to reflect how true this is even of men and women who know most thoroughly the value of time, and are most careful that none of it escapes without giving up and leaving behind something wholesome and profitable. A thorough appreciation of the worth of time means neither more nor less than a just estimate of the things which are worth seeking and possessing; and the vexation which a sensible person feels over wasted time only means that he has been compelled to pursue something which he does not desire nor deem in any way worth pursuing. In this country, particularly, but in some degree perhaps all over the world, there is an absurd and downright pestilent notion that time devoted to pleasure is almost, if not altogether, wasted; or, in other words, that pleasure is an object which we ought to be ashamed, rather than otherwise, of caring much about or running much after. Dull blockheads often affect a grand contempt for pleasure, and they are certainly consistent in steadily abstaining from making any addition to the existing stock of pleasure already in the world. Pleasure is in itself quite as just and worthy an object of pursuit as business, and probably not less than three-fourths of the time that is given to business is only not wasted because success in business is, or ought to be, a stepping-stone to increased opportunities of pleasure and enjoyment. The patent evil, however, is that the level of pleasure is ordinarily placed a great deal lower than it need be.

People incapable of the better and higher states of mind that may be classified as pleasurable seem some how or other to have the power of fixing the average social standard; and it follows that everybody who knows the value of time, and feels the worthlessness of the kind of diversion established in conformity to this standard, consciously shortens his life in following something which he does not want and which does him no good. How many miserable men every night in London at this time of year consume time, at rents and other insupportably devised social gatherings, which would have sufficed for the acquisition of a new language, or of a fair knowledge of chemistry or geology, or of intelligible and coherent views on politics. But, it is said, men live for something else besides chemistry and Greek plays; they do not choose to have the world turned into a gigantic and compulsory kind of Mechanic's Institution. This is perfectly just, only nobody that we have ever heard of desires to make society a big school-room. If social diversions were really diversions, they would have a just place in the scheme of things. But standing in a crowd of people whom you do not care about, and who do not care about you, who have nothing whatever to say to you and who do not want to listen to anything that you may have to say, to have to hearken to simpering songs and feeble fiddling, or perhaps to have to make talk, that most truly terrible of processes—is this, or any thing like this, to pass for diversion? After all, it is better even to turn the world into a big school-room than to keep it as a big baby-house, or bore's paradise. Perhaps it is true that no man can keep his mind wholesome without mixing a good deal with his fellows. But there is all the difference in the world between real intercourse and this trumpery pretence of intercourse. The mere sight of a crowd of people in a drawing room can do one no good in any way. It does not refresh one, nor please one, nor suggest any thing to one. A sensible person would do better to live in a hut in a wood, and subsist on dried pulse and water, than buy society at this cost, or shorten life by this tiresome method.

Take a large portion of all the conversation that an ordinary man has to take a share in. It does not lead to any thing, and is not business. It does not entertain us or recruit us, and is not pleasure. We might just as well spend the time in whipping tops or playing at marbles. There is no exercise of any of the faculties, except that of patience, perhaps, and therefore a good game at tops and marbles would be much better. A consideration like this shows how merely conventional our ideas are. If we heard that a young man or a young woman spent four or five hours every day in whipping a top, we should think such a waste of time severely culpable. As it is, we do not think of an equally purposeless set of habits as involving any waste of time at all, or as being in the least blameworthy in themselves. It would be a palpable folly to suppose that all conversation ought to be of that terrible kind which is usually said to be improving. It would be a sad day when every dinner-table should be constituted into a little Social Science Congress or British Association. It would be a great pity, too, if flirtations and jestings, and all those other pastimes which the rigid sum up as levity, were banished from society. Anything is endurable except sheer stagnation. Every five minutes of stagnation are just as much waste as lighting a cigar with a five-pound note or tossing money into the river, and the more a man either thrusts himself, or what is more common, allows himself to be dragged, into positions where this stagnation prevails, the more open he is to the weighty charge of unthrift in a commodity where unthrift can never be repaired.

In country towns there is a superstition that it is a social duty to allow yourself to stagnate for an hour or an evening when anybody requires this sacrifice of you. The same idea prevails, more or less, everywhere, even among tolerably intelligent people. If anybody persecutes you with proffers of hospitality and entertainment, you are pronounced an ungracious churl should you venture to decline or resist such barbarously cruel kindness. Yet it is not, we fancy, considered to be a social duty to give a guinea to any person who is so odd as to consider it a favor to demand one from you. Nobody would be thought ungracious, or a churl, for refusing to squander his money in this inexplicable and unfruitful fashion. Why is it that nobody is ashamed to require one to squander time in unprofitable profusion, and that, in the matter of time, Catiline's practice in the matter of money would be thought a great deal less shameful, or perhaps not shameful at all—sui profusus, alieni appetens?

Perhaps the secret of the difference may be, that to ask for a neighbor's time for social exercises does not look quite so selfish as to ask for his money. If you ask him to stagnate for two or three hours, you also mean to stagnate by his side for the same time. Can any thing be fairer or more thoroughly impartial? The truth is that people do not know the sacrifice which, in a man with any approach to purpose in life, the intervals of deliberate stagnation imply. The man himself only knows it when, at the end of a month or three months, he counts up the hours in which, to all intents and purposes, he has ceased to exist, ceased to grow, ceased alike to receive or impart ideas or emotions, or to be conscious of any play of any single faculty. It is true that certain moods of sheer passivity are eminently valuable, and the time of the duration of such moods is very far from being mere waste. Perhaps no part of life, in modern times especially, is less of the nature of waste. But the process of stagnating along with a number of fellow-creatures in no sheer passivity. On the contrary, its dullness and deadness are highly irritating; and the languor which creeps over the victim is of a sordid and embarrassing kind, which leaves him exhausted and depressed, instead of recruited. Surely a man might be excused for reflecting at the end of a season on all that he has endured, and on all that he might have done in the same time, if friendly persecutors had only allowed him to rest in peace.

Besides the mysterious and indefensible claims of society, men too often allow themselves to be led captive by small worries and obscure little cares. A man may, in his proper peril, of course, resist the claims of society over him, but he can never quite escape from little fretting troubles, to say nothing of the greater ones. But most people no doubt give much more time to these small troubles than they deserve. They think, and rightly, that because they are troubles they have a claim to attention; but all turns on the question of how much. A great many persons surrender themselves body and soul to paltry cares. They are like a man who should squander a fortune on toys. It would be thought very thriftless to pay a guinea in open market for some thing which might have been got for half a crown. Why should not the same degree of caution attach to those who fail to make their troubles as light and cheap as they can—to beat them down to the lowest possible figure, and to say, like the buyer, It is naught, it is naught? There is every degree of difference in the ways in which people take their minor cares. One man will be as much thrown out of the stoical groove by a bad dinner or a foolish bottle of wine as another by the loss of three parts of his fortune in a broken bank. Another will lose a whole day in lamentations over the sickness of a horse, or the presence of rain when he desired sunshine. A moderate vexation is justified. Anything more than this is waste. Moralists and sermonizers, whether amateur or professional, insist that this exaggeration of sentiment is wrong and wicked, and so on. It would surely be a more effective argument with the majority of mankind to point out what a waste disproportionate attention to small vexation really signifies.

People attach rather vague notions to what is called wrong. But everybody knows exactly what you mean by thrift, whether of money or of opportunities. Nearly everybody, too, cares for something, wishes to have something, and finds pleasure in doing something, over and above all other things. If people are made to see, and to get into the habit of seeing, that prolonged worrying over matters which worrying can not repair is an extravagant waste of time which would carry them a long way in their favorite business, they are far more likely to train themselves to something like a duly proportioned fortitude. The vulgarist mind, with the poorest set of preferences, may shrink from sheer profitless waste of chances of gratifying and improving and increasing its preferences. Perhaps some of the best class of minds are not so acute as they will be one day in discerning how much that passes for useful disposal of time is in truth mere spendthrift prodigality.

GOD'S BLESSING ON TITHES.—Abram was very rich in cattle, and in silver and gold. This is a very brief, but a very strong expression. Let us think on it for a moment. He was rich; he was very rich; he was very rich in each of three particulars—very rich in cattle; very rich in silver; and very rich in gold. Then he must have been very rich indeed in all these combined—cattle, silver and gold. And all this accumulation of riches, must have been effected while he was yearly paying over to the cause of God so large a sum as one-tenth of his income. How can we account for such a success with such an annual subtraction from it otherwise than by supposing that the blessing of God must have rested upon his punctual obedience to this requirement of tithes. For such is the goodness of Abram's God and ours, that he never imposes a burden without coupling a compensating blessing with the patient and faithful bearing of it. Abram knew this much better than some of us in these christian days, and therefore, he had a large, strong and unshaking faith in the goodness and promises of his God; and that faith was never disappointed; but always in due season reaped its reward. It certainly in this instance of tithes, reaped a most magnificent reward, we shall presently see when we have considered the matter yet more thoroughly.

It is reported, that the French Commissioner on the Exhibition has sold the palace in the Champ de Mars, roofs, walls, pillars, etc., to a Russian Company, who are to take possession of it on the 1st of November. It is said the company will take the structure to Russia, and rebuild it at St. Petersburg.

HOUSEKEEPER'S DEPARTMENT.

UNUSABLE OINTMENT.—Obtain a pint of real cream, let it simmer over the fire, or on the side, till it resembles butter, and forms a thick, oily substance, which may be used as ointment for fresh or old wounds, cracked lips or hands.

TO CLEAN WHITE VAILS.—Put the veil in a solution of white soap, and let it simmer a quarter of an hour; squeeze it in some warm water and soap till quite clean. Rinse it from soap, and then in clean cold water, in which is a drop of liquid blue; then pour boiling water on a teaspoonful of starch; run the veil through this, and clear it well by clapping it. Afterwards pin it out, keeping the edges straight and even.

TO PREVENT THE FORMATION OF CRUST UPON THE INSIDE OF TEA KETTLES.—Put into the tea kettle a flat oyster shell, and keep it constantly there; it will attract the stony particles that are in the water to itself, and prevent their forming upon the tea kettle. Or, as the shell occasions a disagreeable noise, regularly clean the inside of the kettle. No crust forms on common saucepans, which are cleaned whenever they are used.

TO MAKE WASH BALLS.—Take two pounds of new white soap, and shave thin into a teacupful of rose water, pouring in as much boiling water as will soften it. Put into a pipkin a pint of sweet oil, fourpenny worth of oil almonds, half a pound of spermaceti, and set all over the fire till dissolved; then add the soap, and half a pound of camphor that has been first reduced to powder by rubbing it in a mortar with a few drops of spirits of wine or lavender water. Boil ten minutes; then pour it into a basin, and stir till it is quite thick enough to roll up into hard balls.

TO MAKE SALT BUTTER FRESH.—Put four pounds of salt butter into a churn with four quarts of fresh milk, and a small portion of arrack. Churn them together, and in about an hour take out the butter, and treat it exactly as fresh butter, by washing it in water, and adding the customary quantity of salt. This is a singular experiment. The butter gains about three ounces in each pound, and is in every particular equal to fresh butter. It would be greatly improved by the addition of two or three ounces of fine sugar, in powder. A common earthen churn answers the same purpose as a wooden one, and may be purchased at any china shop.

WARMING PLASTER.—Burgundy pitch, seven parts; melt and add plaster of caustic, one part. Some add a little camphor. Used in chest complaints, local pains, etc.

BALSAM FOR COUGHS AND COLDS.—Tincture of toll, and compound tincture of benzoin, of each, one ounce; rectified spirit, two ounces. Mix. The dose is one teaspoonful.

MARROW POMATH.—Lard, one pound; suet, half a pound; oil of lemon and cloves, three drachms of each.

LEMONADE.—Powdered sugar, four pounds; citric or tartaric acid, one ounce; essence of lemon, 2 drachms; mix well. Two or three teaspoonfuls make a very sweet and agreeable glass of extemporaneous lemonade.

SWEETMEAT CREAM.—Take some cream and slice some preserved peaches into it, apricots, or plums, sweeten the cream with sugar, or with the syrup the fruit was preserved in; mix all well together.

AFTERNOON CAKES (Swiss).—Mix four ounces of fine flour, two ounces of sifted sugar, the grated peel of a lemon, and half a pound of butter, to a paste, with the white of an egg, and a sufficient quantity of milk. Roll it thin, cut into biscuits, and brush them over with the yolk of an egg, over which sift fine sugar; bake them on tins.

HOW TO CLEAR SOAPSCUDS.—It is well-known that a little alum dissolved is very effective in clearing muddy water; but a short time since, some alum was applied in a manner which, from its novelty and valuable results, is worthy of notice. In a place where water is scarce, a little alum was dissolved in hot water, and thrown into a tub of thick soapscuds. In a short time the soap, curdled, and accompanied by the muddy particles, sank to the bottom, leaving the water above perfectly clear, pure, and devoid of smell. This water was found very useful for washing clothing in again, when poured off the sediment. A similar result was attained in a quick manner by filling a boiler with soapscuds, placing it on a fire, and throwing a bit of alum into it. When the scuds boiled, the scum went over, and left the water clear, soft, and as useful for washing clothes as it had originally been.

How to send money. — We are frequently receiving enquiries upon this point. We have scarcely lost anything by the mails, and consider them safe. The risk at any rate will be ours.

To SUBSCRIBERS.—Any person wishing to subscribe for this paper can do so, by paying the Methodist preacher in the circuit, and forwarding to us his receipt for three dollars with the address of the subscriber upon it, stating Post office, State, Circuit, and Conference. The receipt ought to be taken in duplicate.

DEFICIENCY.

We again suggest that each male member of the Church, hand to the preacher in charge, ONE DOLLAR ON THE FIRST Sabbath in June, to pay what the church owes our Bishops upon last year's salary:—Never mind cyphering it up, brother.

THE EPISCOPAL ADDRESS OF THE BISHOPS OF THE M. E. CHURCH, SOUTH.

We lay before our readers and commend to them this timely and able paper. The immediate occasion of it is the change in the organic structure of our Church, which has been constitutionally adopted. Wise and godly men have made the change, uttering and representing the mind of its ministry and membership. Constitutional changes with us are made with difficulty, and the process goes along from the General Conference down through the Annual Conferences, slowly enough to give ample time for examination, for intelligent, and deliberate action. It is a profound satisfaction to believe that there are many, very many, wiser and holier spirits in the Church of God, than those who may compose the immediate circle of one's own special influence, and while we stay on earth, or live in Heaven, it will be the supreme pleasure of existence to be guided by such superior wisdom.

THE METHODIST PROTESTANT CONVENTION.—We have a verbal report from the Convention of the Methodist Protestant Church recently convened in Montgomery. The Commissioners appointed by the M. E. Church South were present, and the mutual conferences between them and the Convention were full, free, and marked by a most Christian and catholic spirit. They came to no agreement. The matter of church coalescence was referred back to our Commissioners, and to their Annual Conferences. Another Convention to be called, if the conferences advise, during May, 1868. The points of difference were mainly three:

1st. Upon Presiding Elders—the M. P. Church not wishing the office.

2d. Upon the annual appointment of preachers by the Bishops. The M. P. Church desire a right of appeal from the appointing power to the Annual Conference.

3d. Upon the name of the church—the M. P. Church wishing it changed.

NEW ADVERTISEMENTS.

We call attention to the advertisement of the Rock Bridge Alum Springs, of Virginia, which appears in this week's paper. The public, especially the Southern public, have for years been acquainted with the high character which these medicinal waters have for relieving enlargement of the liver, diseases of the kidney, and those incident to morbid action of the viscera. These springs are in the mountains, about one hundred and sixty miles west of Richmond and forty north-west of Atlanta. The Virginia Central Railroad runs within five miles of them. They are in the heart of a most beautiful region. Some of the most classic and interesting spots now upon the North American Continent are within easy reach of this water, as place, which adds no little to its charm.

A LIVING CHURCH.

Churchmen differ upon the evidences of Church vitality. Symptoms which by a Ritualist would be considered favorable, would by any one else be reckoned as fatal to pure Christianity. The Methodist standard of godliness must ever be a high one, so long as the distinctive characteristic of its doctrine is maintained, that religion is life—a new life, preceded by a new birth. According to Luther, not a matter of doing and leaving undone, but of a change in the man; so that it is not new works done, but a new man to do them; not another life but another birth.

This life-idea of religion pervades all the teaching of Mr. Wesley. To have more religion is to have more life.

"More of thy life, and more, I have,
As the old Adam dies."

Life in all the affections of our being prevailing over the merely natural and evil; producing the highest activity in God's service, as well as the greatest devotion to His Kingdom and glory. This life in the individuals which compose the church must be the measure of its vitality. Catholics and High Church Episcopalians look to "the church" to its Episcopacy, its service, its priesthood, and a certain undefined aggregation of venerable things, composing the idea and the expression, as a source of strength and life that is entirely outside of, and distinct from themselves, and fully capable of supplying all their deficiencies, and balancing all their defects.

So that if the whole membership should become worldly, earthly, sensual, or any number thereof be, in life and conversation, never so untrue, blasphemous, or unchaste, the church itself would be shorn of none of its glory, or power. They regard "The Church" as a reservoir of good, of merit, of mercy, and of efficient influence with God upon which they can draw irrespective of any individual piety. This notion leaves them quite free of all restraint, and at liberty to be as worldly as the world; to consult their own inclinations, to go where they please, and do what they please; inasmuch as the honor, and the purity, and the spirituality of the church are conserved by Holy Fathers, and Bishops, and Priests, by consecrated men, and consecrated women, whose prime and sole business is to attend to this thing. A very convenient sort of arrangement this for serving two masters, and for reconciling the temple of God with idols. But this treasury of good works and spiritual life, Methodism does not recognize. The life of any church, with her, is the sum of spiritual life in the members which compose it. A society composed of frivolous, covetous, proud people, as fond of pleasure as they are devoid of the works of faith, cannot by any general theory of the constitution of the church, pass for anything but a dead church. No amount of solemnity at stated periods, or regulation of diet, nor mere roll of the eyeball, nor curvature of form, nor glottal dilatation however subdued, can be accepted as an equivalent for the weightier matters of "repentance toward God, and faith toward our Lord Jesus Christ."

A church may be dead in its very doctrine. It may reject the Divinity of Christ; it may reject the Personality, or the immediate agency of the Holy Spirit; it may virtually reject the Holy Scriptures, by making tradition and the church a sufficient guide and source of truth; or it may make void the Law of God, by preaching universal salvation for the impenitent. Or, on the other hand, it may hold to all the doctrine of Godliness as taught by the Protestant churches, but in spiritual, experimental power be

"trees whose fruit withereth, without fruit, twice dead."

Methodists are much inclined to apply two tests of church animation: do they pay the preacher? do they attend church? If the answer be no, the thing is settled. But suppose it to be yes; then what? Are these two infallible signs? So much stress has of late been placed upon one of these evidences, that other equally vital statistics are in danger of being disregarded. Is there an altar in every family? How do the people attend the prayer-meeting? or those meetings—the best ever devised for holy meditation, and spiritual converse—the love-feast and the class-room? What number of them are there who really delight to talk of Christ; who are inquiring after the full meaning of the "power of the resurrection," who go "beyond their power" in ministering to the saints; who say with increasing heartiness of faith, "Thine is the kingdom?"

"Who, passing through the mournful vale,
Drink comfort from the living well,
That flows replenished from above;
From strength to strength advancing here,
Till all before their God appear,
And each receives the crown of love."

If we abound in spiritual life we shall want for no good thing.

The Holy Spirit will fill our churches with people; will keep our young people from straying off to other folds; will replenish the Stewards; will improve the quality of our preaching; will supply our Zion with ministers, and missionaries, and will generously support her missions to the heathen; and will make all things work together for good to her.

NEWS OF THE DAY.

The fire of revenge burns steadily in the hearts of our Northern brethren. The release of Mr. Davis gives no satisfaction to their Methodist Journals. They think he ought to be hung. They are much afraid that his being out on bail will elate the Southern people, and give occasion to new outbursts of rebellious temper. They are resolved to believe that the entire South is still in a state of latent war. They harp on the two strings—the rebellion and the freedman.

In fine contrast with these morose, ghostly conservators of peace, is the following from the Boston Courier:

"Our local radical organs are greatly exercised by the release of Jefferson Davis on bail, and regard Horace Greeley as little better than demented for writing his autograph next to that of the 'Arch-traitor,' on the bail bonds. In their opinion, somebody ought to have been hung for treason, to give the Federal Government a proper lease of existence. The despotic governments of the Old World have all been soaked and cemented in the blood of innumerable political victims and martyrs, and they would have one helpless old man, at least, sacrificed on the altar of the Union, to appease the injured genius of a government which itself was born and nurtured in rebellion. That mercy which droppeth as the gentle dew from heaven, our local radical editors do not like. Like the Gaiour in the tale of Vathek, they mutter for blood and refuse to be comforted at the escape of their victim. This is an amiable frame of mind, but we do not think it does any credit to our community. It is local, narrow and implacable. Far more honorable, Christian and useful is the disposition evinced by Messrs. Greeley, Gerritt Smith, and Augustus Schell. We are glad that the Federal Government has at last relieved itself of the odium of detaining in one of its fortresses a State prisoner whom it would neither try nor release. We do not want a government like ours to be baptized in the blood of political victims. Treason, attainder, outlawry, confiscation and arbitrary arrests are things and words, which we hope to see never flourishing in popular dictionaries, and under a system of government professedly based on the consent of the governed. It is high time that bygone were bygone between the North and South, it is high time that an era of kindly feeling were ushered in. We believe that at this late day the very worst use that the Federal Government could make of Jefferson Davis would be to hang him for treason. We honor Horace Greeley for the part which he took in procuring the release of Mr. Davis."

The jury impanelled by Judge Underwood consisted of John Minor Botts, three negroes, and others, and is described as being a cold, clammy, rancid looking set.

By the by, the negro in this city is beginning to show signs of ingratitude toward those who have been photographed with him. The reverend gentleman who has been so assiduously rendering to Caesar the things that are Caesar's, at length discovers that he can count upon neither Pompey or Caesar. The Tribune, the freedman's paper, pronounces him an "interloper." Sad, sad. But republicans are proverbially ungrateful. Fortunately he is not wholly dependent upon gratitude. He has been more than commonly conspicuous of late, calling public meetings to order, reading out heterogeneous lists of Vice-Presidents, besides doing some work about municipal lobbies not strictly professional. His friends at the North have no adequate idea of how severely the present campaign is taxing his somewhat retiring disposition. It is to be hoped that these more public engagements will not interrupt or seriously derange his regular lectures as President of the Thompson Biblical, because that pays. That he has many warm admirers among the colored people we have reason to believe, though Bishop Campbell pronounces him to be "one of the vilest enemies of the African M. E. Church." The colored brethren see a good deal in him, yet. Many a dollar he has collected for them; and they know that as long as "Old Mother" gives milk, he can help them get it. They will use him as long as he can be made useful, and then they will cast him off as an unprofitable branch. The curious part of all this is that he imagines that he is using them, which is also true, so far as his Northern clients are concerned. Should those evil counsels prevail and cause his removal from this point, which we have seriously feared, it will be a long time before one can be found who combines the politician, the professor, the philanthropist, and the preacher in such happy proportions. He has done a good deal of work for Bishop Ames—first and last, not the cleanest sort of jobs, either; he has affiliated most heartily with the several sets of military men and "loyal men" who have controlled this department; he has sustained the stars and stripes with unmeasured zeal and eloquence, and if any services can merit repose, he should not be disturbed.

In addition to the failure of the First National Bank last week, we have this week news of the failure of the house of Trenholm & Co., in Liverpool, and of other houses there largely engaged in the American trade. The money market here is snappily tight, and there is much want of confidence in business circles. We urge upon everybody to economize, and to put no money away that gives no sound when it falls. Spend no money in visiting North-cru springs, or in any sort of dissipation. There are thousands who will be furnishing in less than two months; who now have a little, and but very little, necessary food. We must not turn our people over to the tender mercies of New England, but divide with them the last loaf. So shall the God of the harvest bless us. It is by their unanimous efforts to sustain the planter and farmer that some of our merchants have brought themselves to the verge of ruin. Such houses are to be regarded with favor, and should not be classed with those who by sheer selfish speculation have outwitted themselves and others.

The dismissal of the Mississippi and Georgia application for protection, must suggest to every thinking man that the Supreme Court of the United States consults, in its decisions, the will of Congress and the views of politicians rather than the principles of law and the Constitution. It has ceased to be a bulwark of constitutional liberty.

For the N. O. Christian Advocate.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

DEAR BROTHER: We have had at Tallassee, the past few weeks, a glorious revival. Not only did sixteen profess a saving faith in Christ Jesus the Lord, and connect themselves with the Church, and bid fair to make good members, but, sir, the members of the Church of long standing were much encouraged and strengthened, and, in a word, the whole Church energized and more fully spiritualized. Tallassee society is now in a better condition than it has been probably since the beginning of the war.

We have also a good Sabbath-school, numbering now about eighty scholars—the best at this place in years. The Lord be praised for his goodness.

R. A. TIMMONS.

Tallassee, Ala., May 17, 1867.

The following revival news is from the Albany Weekly News, Georgia:

THE MEETING.—The revival meeting is still in progress at the Methodist Church. Quite a number have already joined the Church, and scores are found at the altar every night. The meeting will be continued during the present week. Rev. J. P. Duncan thus far has been the principal laborer in this good work. He has crowded houses every night to listen to his earnest presentations of the gospel. Rev. J. S. Key, of Macon, arrived last evening, and was greeted with a full house. May the good work go on.

FROM OTHER CHURCHES.

EPISCOPAL—ENGLISH.

Dr. Pusey, in a remarkable speech delivered before the meeting of the Church Union, counselled the Sacramentarians to observe great quietness and temperance of language, and to show great respect for the bishops while they stuck firmly to their purpose. By the observance of these things he assured them that finally they could be victorious. He said—"The attack is upon the whole sacramental system; but so long as the Prayer-book remains as it is, so long will all these things remain in the Church of England. The Nonconformists see this very plainly, and they have pointed it out very well. Our people will soon see it too; they will see that the Prayer of Consecration itself would be a mockery unless it were meant to express the Real Presence; and that, therefore, nothing would content those who make this attack but giving up the Prayer-book. And thus there are but two ways of meeting them—either to resist them, or to split the Church of England to pieces. Then, again, there is another thing which I would say. What do people suppose they would gain by stopping this ritual? Of course the result of stopping the ritual must be that the doctrines must be taught with ten times more earnestness than they were before."

ENGLAND.

So called Christian England has many laws and customs which savor more of barbarism than of civilization. Let the following be taken as a sample: A poor American boy, confined in Stafford Gaol, lately hung himself, under circumstances which excited much commiseration. He had been convicted of a very trifling theft, though it was a second offence, and the Quarter Sessions justices had sentenced him to three months imprisonment and a dozen lashes. In absolute terror of the dread punishment of the "cat," he put an end to his existence within an hour after he was taken back from the court to the gaol. A coroner's jury found that he had committed suicide while in a state of temporary insanity; but when his body was taken to the cemetery for interment, the clergyman in whose parish the ground is situated, refused to let the Burial Service be read over it. This intemperate scrupulousity excited the indignation of the visiting justices, one of whom, himself a clergyman, brought the matter before the full bench of Staffordshire magistrates; and the upshot was that the Court unanimously agreed to a resolution expressing much regret, not merely that the clergyman had in this instance harshly interpreted the Rubric, which directs that the Burial Service shall not be read over a person laying violent hands upon himself, but that any person who may take away his life in a state of insanity, temporary or otherwise, should be denied the rites of Christian burial."

IRELAND.

A table has recently been published, setting forth the wealth of certain Irish Protestant bishops who have died in this generation. Exclusive of real property, and of money settled on their families, or otherwise disposed of in the lifetime of these dignitaries, no less than twelve have died possessed of "cash" to the amount of upwards of £10,000. One reached £80,000, three over £70,000, and two £50,000. If we knew the value of the estates left by the self-same spiritual fathers, the figures might be still more startling. Yet they were novices compared with their predecessors, ten of whom, dying between 1810 and 1830, bequeathed a million and a half to their heirs. Can we wonder, then, that the Norfolk News at the disaffection of Ireland and the discontent of Irish Catholics when "fleece" to this awful extent found upon the shepherds who presided over the flock? The "fleece" system, as it is called, is in our opinion the only real grievance of which the Irish have to complain. It is not an exclusive grievance to Roman Catholics. It falls with at least equal weight on all dissenters.

Romanism is still on the wane and Protestantism relatively on the increase in Ireland. This is resulting more from emigration, perhaps, than from any change of opinion, though instances are occurring in which Irish Catholics are undergoing changes of opinion.

WHAT WE NEED.

The plan of the organization of the Board of Home Missions is of second importance. Far more important is which will work by any system which will give life and efficiency to that which appears useless—the spirit of mission. No one plan is free from objection, theory, and serious defects in operation, no one is suited to all circumstances and persons. But any one, with the fully awakened to the importance of work, thoroughly imbued with its spirit, and burning with enthusiasm, will accomplish wonders, and without it, the perfect organization will be useless. A person cannot go wrong in buying one of the leading reapers. A man who will give the spirit for working machinery, enters into the movement of every wheel and shaft, can use any one to advantage while the best machines are thrown away as useless by others, because they have that spirit. The Methodists, the Episcopians, the Presbyterians of every denomination have their Home Missionary machinery, each one thinking all the others imperfect, but where we find a living, earnest missionary spirit, and there only do we find success; where that is lacking, we hear noise and feel the jarring of the machinery; but these are but unimportant results.

Our great need to day, is the spirit of missions. Our pastors need to be awakened; there is a field about them even as large for them. Our Presbyteries need to be awakened; there are within their communities as destitute, and as willing to receive the gospel as any in all the land. Our missionaries need the baptism of the Holy Spirit, they may go forth, not simply by appointment of the Board, but by an impulse from their own hearts. Our editors need it, the columns of their papers be filled with earnest words and living truths, that quicken the zeal of the whole church. Next Assembly, will need it in its measure, that it may not lose sight of the great work in the heat of excited discussion. With that spirit in power, the glorious results may be accomplished. Let us pray for that spirit—the spirit of Faith and works; faith in the power of the gospel to overcome the world, and to maintain the purity of the church, and to bring that gospel in contact with the souls.—[United Presbyterian.]

"Grand Army of the Republic," in the Tribune, the organ of the colored population of this city, we find the following just below 'Gov. Wells' recent proclamation:

HEADQUARTERS, DEPT. OF LOUISIANA, GRAND ARMY OF THE REPUBLIC, ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE, New Orleans, La., March 6, 1867.

The following named comrades are hereby detailed and announced as members of the Provisional Staff of this Department, to do duty at these Headquarters: Capt. Chas. S. Merritt, Adjutant General; Col. A. S. Bader, Maj. E. E. Adams, W. G. McConnell, middle camp. They will be respected accordingly, and hereby authorized to establish and organize in localities not in the jurisdiction of district commanders, announced in orders at these Headquarters.

The Department is hereby divided into the following districts:

The First District comprises that part of the Department known as the parish of Orleans, and that part of the parish of St. Louis lying above Canal street.

The Second District comprises that part of the Department lying below Canal street, in the city of New Orleans, and extending to the Gulf.

The Third District comprises that part of the Department above the First District, the east side of the Mississippi river, and above Red River, with headquarters at Alexandria.

The Fourth District comprises that part of the Department lying west of the Second District and South of Red River, with headquarters at Opelousas.

Col. Simon Jones is hereby assigned to the command of the First District, with headquarters at New Orleans.

Maj. D. Urban is hereby assigned to the command of the Second District, with headquarters at New Orleans.

Until further orders, Posts in the First and Fourth Districts, will report directly to these Headquarters.

To prevent informality in the muster of recruits in this Department, it is hereby announced for the information of command, that recruits will be mustered only in regularly constituted posts, by District Commanders in the establishment of posts, except by the Grand Commander, an officer of his staff, or by special authority from these headquarters.

Attention of officers is particularly directed to articles 5, 9, 11, and 15 of the regulations of the Grand Army of the Republic, and the strict enforcement of provisions especially enjoined. Staff officers will be enrolled as members of posts, and reported by the posts to which belong as upon detached service.

By order of B. O. WARMON, Grand Commander, H. Merritt, Adjutant General.

The following suggestive order, which fell wrong hands, and was published in the Times of the 8th inst., is indicative of the character of the organization:

HEADQUARTERS G. A. R., DEPT. OF ORLO, February 6, 1867.

Post No. 1, Sub Division 84:—I am directed to forward to the Major at Napoleon (in cypher) 150 of the word breech-loaders for the use of the company, which shall be subject to order.

On sign the above receipts, and return to me.

As, sir, respectfully, your ob't. serv't, A. S. KIMBLE, Chief of Ordnance, Dept. of Ohio.

Orleans, Mobile and Chattanooga Railroad.

The route of this road is admirably chosen. It is one which was selected for a national thoroughfare by the National Government fifty-two years ago, and surveyed; but this route from Chattanooga, over the natural dividing ridge, was never constructed.

Forms the base of a triangle of roads already constructed from New Orleans, North and East, and a line one hundred and twenty miles shorter between New Orleans and New York than any rail yet in existence.

It follows, first from Chattanooga, an extremely straight line, looking out and Will's Valley, for instance of one hundred and sixty miles on each side of which is a continuous range of the best iron coal mines, according to the geological survey, yet discovered in the world. There are also other valuable minerals, as well as quarries of limestone, marble, slate, etc., each of which now looks the other way at Selma and other points.

boats on the Cahaba, Coosa, and other streams. Twenty-two miles the road is completed along Lookout Valley, while the grading, masonry, etc., of sixty miles more, through the same and Will's, are nearly ready to receive the structure—or eighty-two miles all.

After passing through the whole length of this great mineral region of Alabama, and the Cahaba coal field, emerging a little east of Tuscaloosa, the route following along the natural ridge which divides the Alabama and Tombigbee valleys, and over the greatest cotton belt of the South, and in Alabama—one of the richest and best cultivated cotton raising sections in the whole country, thence on to Mobile, over a rich and thickly populous country, entering the State diagonally from the northeast to the southwest, and over in its whole course crossing a single stream which ever overflows its banks at the part traversed, so near the sources of all does it grow them.

From Mobile the line is a perfect straight one to the Gulf of Pas-caoula, a village watering place at the mouth of the fine river of the same name, which with its branches, furnishes large quantities of lumber to New Orleans. The saw mills near this village have increased since the war from four or five in number to twenty or more, and have this season furnished near a million feet of lumber per week to this city. Thence it passes through all the other fashionable watering places and resorts along the Gulf, as Biloxi, Mississippi City, Pass Christian, etc., the Rigolets, and enters New Orleans via the wide avenue of Claiborne, to its heart at Canal street, without encountering a rise, in its whole five hundred miles in length, of over thirty feet to the mile, and between Mobile and New Orleans—one hundred and forty miles—of over twenty-six feet to the mile.

POLITICAL NEWS.

Registration in the country shows the same disproportion between blacks and whites which has been manifested here. In Plaquemines, Iberville parish, for instance, out of 700 voters registered, about sixty only were white. What do our white people think of the voluntary abdication of their citizenship which is thus portended? As sure as they live, those who do register will form and be the State, and it white men do not become citizens under the constitution thus framed, they never will unless by revolution. Whatever brainless men, without responsibilities or ties, may think of the alternative, we solemnly protest against the suicidal folly of giving up the State wholly to the black minority. It is not just to them; it is infinitely unjust to our wives and children.—Pacyane.

This disproportion between white and black registration obtains in Texas. A gentleman just returned from the Court House of that parish reports that 600 blacks had registered and twelve whites. This is significant, and indicates how rigidly the registrars have construed the military bill. The same result in East Feliciana demonstrates that the white voters in this State are required, all of them, to the last man, to prevent the State from being placed completely in the hands of the negroes. If our people, from any cause, will not register and vote now, they must prepare themselves for a constitution which will forever disfranchise all that have ever by word, deed, wish, or dream, favored the Confederacy.

MOBILE, May 20.—The following order was issued this afternoon: "HEADQUARTERS POST OF MOBILE, May 19, 1867."

"Gen. Swayne, commanding the military district of Alabama, directs the issue of the following:

"To prevent further violence growing out of the disturbed condition of affairs, the undersigned assumes the maintenance of public order in the city of Mobile.

"The city police administration is hereby suspended, and special policemen or members of the old force may be employed when necessary. Breaches of city ordinances will be tried as heretofore. All violations of the public peace and existing orders will be dealt with by the military.

"Outdoor congregations, after nightfall, are prohibited. When public demonstrations are intended, notice must be filed at the mayor's office in season to permit the presence of such police force as may be deemed essential.

"Severe responsibilities are attached to the publication of articles commending or inciting riot, or violence to individuals, or the public use of incendiary language, or occurrence of disorder in rooms of public entertainment.

J. L. SREPHARD, "Colonel Commanding."

The National Reconstruction Club of the Eighth Ward was to have a weekly meeting last night. Our engagements did not permit us to attend the meeting, but we have assurance that the club is zealously at work, and that registration under its organization is assuming a more hopeful color.

The committee on correspondence of the State reconstruction committee was in session last evening, and steps were taken to obtain full information from every parish in the State as to the political situation.

Our citizens of German origin, we hear, are about to initiate a movement of a conservative character. A meeting has been suggested, and we are assured, will be held, to unite the Teutonic people in our midst, with their white brethren, born in this and other lands.

The Germans, as well as every other class of intelligent citizens, are realizing the terrible consequences that must result from the ascendancy of ignorance and incendiarism.—Crescent.

WASHINGTON, May 20.—Attorney General Stanbery has been before the judiciary committee all day. This and other pressing public business postpone the completion of his opinion on reconstruction matters. Various statements are published in regard to the character of the attorney general's opinion, all of which are mere speculations, without authority. Elaborate investigation and patient reflection are devoted to even minor points.

LATEST NEWS.

WASHINGTON, May 22.—The appointment of Assistant Treasurer for New Orleans is not yet made.

The statements of a probable meeting of Congress, in July, to meet Treasury difficulties, is mere speculation. No Treasury officer has suggested or expects a meeting for any such purpose, as the Treasury will require no relief.

WASHINGTON, May 22.—Though largely interested in the estate of Messrs. Frezer, Trenholm & Co., the Government has received no official advice of their suspension.

Special dispatches to the Herald says: "Troy, May 21.—Indications abound that new and formidable Fenian invasions are being rapidly organized, and that a large body of troops will be concentrated on the frontier within a few weeks, with a view of seizing Canada."

WASHINGTON, May 22.—All necessary rules and forms in bankruptcy have been adopted, and a manual of some hundred pages prepared by Clinton Rice, Secretary of the Commission of Justice, by their order will issue on Tuesday. No delay or difficulty is apprehended in putting the law in effect on first of June.

All Registers have been nominated, and in case District Judges do not confirm nominations, they are empowered to fill vacancies with suitable persons.

MOBILE, May 22.—A military order was issued this evening, by direction of Major General Pope, deposing the present Mayor and Chief of Police, and appointing Castanos-Horton Mayor, and Col. Deon Chief of Police.

Gen. Withers, ex-Mayor, in a letter to Colonel Shepherd, says he submits to the argument of the bayonet and vacates the office of Mayor, to which he was elected while a paroled prisoner, and not allowed by the military authorities to discharge the duties of the office until he had been pardoned by the President, taking an oath to support the Constitution and Government of the United States. During his continuance in office he has not been untrue to either the letter or spirit of the oath. He solemnly protests against the imputation implied by his removal. In conclusion he thanks Col. Shepherd for uniform kindness and consideration.

FOREIGN.

The London Times, in speaking of the recent Hyde Park demonstration, says the public are surprised to hear that the Government permitted the demonstration and resolved not to interfere. The authorities had 15,000 special constables. A reinforcement of military has been ordered from Aldershot. Cavalry was brought up, and a plan of operations perfected in case the police became inadequate. Forty or fifty thousand people were present, and the crowd was one of the most orderly ever assembled.

The New York Herald of the 18th says: Our special correspondence from Constantinople, dated the 20th of April, contains matter relative to the progress of the Eastern question to a war crisis, which is of the highest importance, particularly when read in connection with our cable dispatches announcing the defeat of Omar Pasha in two severe battles in Caadria, and the renewed representation of the great Powers to the Sultan as to the advisability of the cession of Crete to Greece.

Russia, according to the report, was gradually encircling the Turkish provinces, due east, south, and south-west, with her troops, and large bodies of the soldiers of the Czar were stationed near Simferopol, between Kars and Tiflis, while the country between Kars and Ezeroum, in Armenia, was scoured by Russian cavalry. Sebastopol, "stronger than ever," had one hundred and fifty thousand men in and around the city. Odessa was filled with troops, and it was quite evident that Russia was prepared to administer at any moment to the effects of the "sick man" with profit to herself.

Bankrupt almost in treasury finance, the Sultan was surrounded with home difficulties tending even to open insurrection in the capital. In a case of grievance to some Italian fishermen, the Minister of Victor Emmanuel recently appeared in the Imperial presence, and demanded redress in haughty and peremptory language. The people subject to the Porte groan under the heavy load of taxation which they are called on to bear, while French officers travel the interior of the empire, noting and reporting on its industrial capacities, products, and mines.

Chalmers, Loyola and Luther.

Dr. Hanno, the biographer and son-in-law of Chalmers, gives the following striking comparison between the spiritual process through which these great men were led to a religious life. He says:

"Loyola's great effort was to tread the world beneath his feet, and to rise into a mystic region of rapt idealism, where high spiritual intercourse with the unseen world might be enjoyed. The main stress of his struggle was to mortify the desires of the flesh and of the mind, to spiritualize the carnal nature."

Luther's great effort, prompted by an urgent sense of guilt, was to reconcile himself to an offended Deity; and the main stress of his struggle was to bring into a state of right adjustment his personal and immediate relationship with God."

Dr. Chalmers' great effort was to prepare for an eternity left to be at hand, by discharging aright the duties of time; and the main stress of his struggle was to bring his disposition and conduct towards all around him up to the requirements of the Divine law."

Loyola busied himself mainly with fastening upon the flesh, and sustaining the communion which bound him to the spiritual world, as that world was conceived of and believed in. Luther based himself mainly on his legal standing before the High Judge of all the earth, and was still trying, over and over again, the question of his acceptance or his condemnation, before the bar of eternal justice. Dr. Chalmers' used himself mainly with the state of his affections and behavior towards his fellow men, with all of whom he tried to be on terms of perfect and cordial affinity ere he passed into eternity.

The devotional elements predominated with the first, the legal with the second, and the moral and the social with the third, but of his severe and prolonged struggle Loyola found his exit by casting himself into the bosom of the church, and giving himself up to the devotions which she prescribed; and the services which she demanded; but of their struggle Luther and Dr. Chalmers unlike found their exit by casting themselves into the bosom of their Saviour and giving themselves up to all the duties of life, spiritual and social, as those who had been fully and freely regenerated into God through Jesus Christ their Lord."

MASS MEETING OF THE RADICALS.—The mass meeting held last Saturday in Lafayette Square, by the extreme radicals of the city, caused considerable excitement. It was the first meeting of the kind which ever took place in our great city, and of course attracted more than ordinary attention. A large platform, decorated with evergreens and our national emblem, was erected in the square. Long before dark the colored population commenced assembling around the stand. About half-past 7 o'clock sky rockets were fired off and illuminated the heavens, and soon after colored "clubs," headed by bands of music, came from every direction in the city and pushed their way into the square.

When the meeting was organized we suppose there was upwards of four thousand persons in the vicinity—men, women and children. Four fifths of these were colored. The stand from which the audience was addressed was crowded, and the colored population filled almost every available spot. The meeting was called to order by Dr. Newman, and the Rev. Mr. Smith, colored, delivered a long prayer. He spoke in such a low tone that we, though near, were unable to catch one solitary word of his exhortation. His prayer was of great length, at the conclusion of which Mayor Edward Healy was selected as president of the meeting, and a long list of vice-presidents and secretaries read and approved.

SPECIAL NOTICES.

THE BOTTLED WATER

Rockbridge Alum Springs, Va.

These MINERAL WATERS have an established reputation for very high curative virtues in the treatment of diseases of the digestive and urinary systems, and as being an ABSOLUTE SPECIFIC in several of them.

Scrophula, and all the forms of Glandular swellings and Catarrhs, Eruptive Diseases, Eczema, Tetter, Eczema, etc., Chronic Diarrhoea, Dysentery, Hypertrophy, Bronchitis, Chronic Affections of the Kidneys and Bladder, Dropsy and Piles, in all Acute Conditions of the System and Broken Down States of the Constitution, Loss of Appetite and General Nervous Prostration.

Their Powers and Virtues as a Restorative may be safely pronounced to be

WITHOUT A KNOWN RIVAL!

Amongst the Mineral Waters of the World. They are specially indicated in the whole class of ailments peculiar to the Female Constitution.

The Springs of Pamplin, with an analysis of Professor Hays, of Boston, and letters of Dr. Cutler, of New Orleans, Prof. Cabell, of the University of Virginia, Drs. Moorman and Graham, of Virginia, Drs. T. G. Thomas and Thomas Addis Emmett of New York, and of other distinguished men of the Clergy and other Professions, abundantly attest what is here said of the virtue of this WATER.

Can be had on application to the Agents, Purcell, Ladd & Co., Wholesale Druggists, Richmond, Va.; A. B. Rucker, Lynchburg, Va.; Coleman and Rogers, Baltimore, Md.; Hoggan & Co., Druggists, New York, are kept in regular supply of the WATER and POWDERS direct from the Springs.

Orders sent to either of the above Houses, or to the Proprietors, must be accompanied with the money, as no accounts will be kept.

CAUTION.—In ordering the WATER, it will not do simply to order "A Box of Alum Water." If you want this Water, be careful to say "ROCKBRIDGE ALUM WATER," and so also of the Salt or Mass.

The Springs will be opened on the first of June.

Capt. W. H. SALE will continue, as heretofore, General Superintendent. He is well known to the Springs going public.

J. W. BLACKMAN'S COMMER-

NEW ORLEANS MARKETS.

From the N. O. Price Current.

The principal feature of the general market since our last report is the active movement in our leading staple, which commenced on Saturday, under the stimulating influence of the political and commercial news from Europe. Every other department of trade has exhibited increased dullness. Nothing of any moment has been done in either Sugar or Molasses, and most articles of Western Produce have been inanimate and drooping. This is especially the case with Corn which, under a limited demand and liberal supplies, has materially declined from last week's prices.

The Pacific news from Europe has had a weakening influence on Foreign Exchange, and, owing to local causes, the movement has exhibited not much animation, while Domestic has been still more depressed, and closed at a decline from last week's rates.

COTTON.—We left the market at the time of our last report, with only a moderate supply offering, and exhibiting increased firmness. On Saturday, buyers came forward with considerable spirit, and took fully 5,500 bales. On Monday the sales were 3,500 bales, at irregular rates. Tuesday the business did not exceed 2,700 bales, mostly at prices approximating to our subjoined quotations.

This makes an aggregate for the past three days of 11,700 bales, taken partly for the North, but mostly for foreign export.

The receipts proper since Friday evening comprise 2666 bales, against 2345 during the corresponding period last week, showing an increase of 321 bales.

The receipts at this port, since the 1st of September, (exclusive of the arrivals from Mobile, Florida and Texas,) are 668, 917 bales, against 633,552 bales to same date last year, and the decrease in the receipts at all the ports, up to the latest dates, as compared with last year, is 155,252 bales. In the exports from the United States to foreign countries, as compared with the same dates last year, there is a decrease of 72,890 bales to Great Britain, of 46,521 to France, and an increase of 34,227 bales to other foreign ports.

We quote as follows:

Low	Ordinary	Good Ordinary	Low Middling	Middling
19 to 21	22 to 24	24 to 26	26 to 28	28 to 30

TOBACCO.—Supplies are coming in more freely, and there is a good demand. The sales during the last three days embrace upwards of 300 hogheads. The market is firm and we continue to quote:

Low	Ordinary	Good Ordinary	Low Middling	Middling
19 to 21	22 to 24	24 to 26	26 to 28	28 to 30

FLOUR.—The market is dull and depressed, although the stock on hand is not large. Sales for the past three days sum up 2,900 barrels, within our quotations.

CORN.—The receipts have been large since our last review, buyers have held aloof, and prices have declined fully 50 per bushel.

Monetary.

The Money Market has been unusually excited by the forced suspension of the First National Bank, and the previous stringency increased by the considerable amount of private deposits locked up in its vaults by the summary proceedings of the United States Treasury agents. While the general movement has consequently been on a much more restricted scale, extreme difficulty has been experienced in making the negotiations rendered imperative by such an untoward condition of affairs.

EXCHANGE.—The movement in foreign bills has been quite limited, with the previous wide margin between the ordinary run of commercial signatures and those of bank and private bankers. The sales of Sterling include $20,000 on Saturday, mostly bank, etc., at 146 to 146½ for A1 clear, and 148½ to 149 and 149½ for bank, and about the same amount on Monday at 145 to 147½ for the former, and 148½ to 149 for some favorite signatures. Yesterday the sales included $7,000 good clear and A1 at 145 to 146½, and about $5,000 bank and bankers at 146½ to 150.

N. O. WHOLESALE PRICES.

SUPPORT OF THE MINISTRY.

Mr. Editor: There seems to be anxiety manifested in various parts, in regard to the support of the ministry. As this is an old existent only renewed year after year, no one should be alarmed. An unfavorable spring, a drought or a short crop has always produced just such panics. Even before the late spring, when wealth abounded in every community, the support of their pious and laborious pastors, was considered a burden to many stations, and many circuits.

It notwithstanding the carelessness and indifference, penurious-

ness of thousands of church members, yet the Lord, in his goodness, has always provided for his ministry. Every true and faithful teacher of the gospel, who is in the discharge of his duty, may truly say, "The Lord is my shepherd, I am not want."

The question has frequently been asked, why is it that the Methodist preachers pay their salaries so poorly? Is it for the want of ability, industry, or piety? No. The Methodist is the wealthiest church

in the land, none surpasses her in devotion, and her piety and good works are seen and read of all men.

The reader will ask, why is it then?

It may be accounted for on the simple, that where little is asked,

little will be given. The salaries of our preachers, up to the present time, have been a mere pittance, and this amount being small, has almost invariably been raised by a few

thousands have been educated and trained to pay nothing.

There is not much difference now in point of property, and the time has come, when each member must contribute in his mite. If all would do it, it would be but an easy matter to pay the salary of any preacher in the Conference. Stewards and members should make it a conscientious duty to pay their preachers, and never let them go away

without having received the last dollar. By not paying your pastor, you do him a great injury, you commit a great wrong, and teach our people to sin. It is certainly sin for any one not to pay a just due, when he can do so. I have never been able to understand how it is, that a church membership can grow in grace, and enjoy the religion of the Saviour, when they know that the minister who breaks the bread of life to them, Sabbath after

Sabbath, is in want of the necessaries of life. In a country congregation, which has failed to pay twenty five, fifty or a hundred dollars of a small assessment, they all feel very rich, before services commence, on the day of the farewell sermon,

and during the sermon they shed

tears, at the thought of parting with such a dear pastor forever, and say that he may have souls for his hire; and when they have bid him

God's speed, and turned away, the word is all gone. These thoughts for the good of the church, and the salvation of souls. The Lord will take care of us, if we will do our duty. A.

ENTERPRISE, Miss., May 17, 1867.

Mr. Editor: Minutes of a meeting do not tell all its story. Our District Meeting in Meridian was an interesting and refreshing time. If I could get all its good speeches, prayers, songs, and sermons
into the minutes, or into this letter, it would stand out in striking proportions
before the mind of the Church as the event of the season in Macon District.

Bishop Wightman was with us, looking well and preaching with a power never known to be equalled by those of us who have heard him before. His manner of presiding over the Meeting was of a character to win our love and highest respect.
We never listened to a sermon of grander proportions than that delivered by him on Sunday morning in the Methodist Church.
—Text, Psalms 80, i.—and through the whole of it, from beginning to end, there was an undertone of the most winning and moving pathos.

Bro. S. H. Cox, our Presiding Elder,
was present and at his work faithfully,
consistently, and, as usual, successfully.
The Church in our district is growing up under his supervision with that consistent symmetry that arises from attending to all its interests.

The general reports from churches were encouraging. Bro. Thomas began a meeting in his Church (Meridian) that is still in progress, with good results so far. The spirit of revival seems to be spreading.
May the good work go on.

DISTRICT MEETING—MACON DISTRICT MO-BILE CONFERENCE.

Pursuant to previous notice the District Meeting of Macon District convened in the Methodist Church in the city of Meridian, Miss., Friday, May 3, 1867.

The Presiding Elder of the District, Rev.
S. H. Cox, in the chair, by whom the Meeting was opened with appropriate religious services.

The following persons were present and registered as members:

S. H. Cox, Presiding Elder, Macon
District.

MERIDIAN—O. P. Thomas, Pastor, R.
V. Rev. S. A. D. Steele, J. H. Gibbs.

MACON—J. Bancroft, Pastor, H. W.
Foote, Judge Beauchamp.

GAINESVILLE AND SCOTTS—J. C. Huckabee, Pastor, W. H. Gill, A. K. Ramsey.

MARION—Wm. Spillman, Pastor.

LIVINGSTON—Thos. A. S. Adams, Pastor.

DEKALB—J. M. Gann, Pastor, L. M.
Horton.

SUMMERVILLE—R. J. Walker.

ENTERPRISE—Thos. S. Abernethy, Jr., Pastor.

Rev. W. L. C. Hunicut, of Mississippi Conference, visiting.

The following committees were appointed
on Public Worship: O. P. Thomas, S.
H. Cox, S. A. D. Steele. On Business:

J. O. Huckabee, H. W. Foote, R. J.
Walker.

The plan of holding District Meetings, adopted by the Holston Conference, was read and it was agreed that we conform to that plan so far as practicable.

J. M. Gann presented certain resolutions from the DeKalb circuit, providing for Sabbath preaching to all churches on circuits and for the more efficient support of the ministry—laid over for the present.

Hours of meeting and adjournment
were fixed, and the Meeting adjourned until to-morrow morning at 8 o'clock.

Benediction by the President.

SATURDAY 8 A. M.—Met at the appointed hour. Bishop Wightman in the chair, who opened the Meeting with the usual religious services. Yesterday's minutes
read and approved.

The following persons not present on yesterday were recognized as members:

DEKALB—L. M. Boyd, W. G. Hill, T.
H. Bell.

MARION—Aaron Jones, G. W. Melniais,
J. W. Wedgeworth, Wm. G. Grace, D.
Maggard, Wm. Stokes, Hays Rogers, Geo.
Bancroft, Dr. P. King, Wm. C. Day, L.
Turner.

The Committee on Business, appointed on yesterday, made their report, which was adopted as follows:

First. Consideration of the resolutions from DeKalb circuit presented by J. M.
Gann.

Second. Reports from members of the Meeting in the following order:

1. Relation of Children to the Church,
by Rev. W. Spillman.

2. Sunday Schools, by Meridian
Church.

3. Duty of the Church to the Ministry—J. Bancroft.

There can be but little doubt

that rights of person and property,
are fully secured in the dominions of England. Under the aegis of her flag, the exiles, from every land, in every time have found protection. The liberal colonial policy of late adopted by the Crown, is an additional guarantee for the largest measure of liberty.

Governed by its own local legislature, this colony enacts local laws to meet its own exigencies, while the Common law underlies the whole legal fabric. British Honduras is a dependency of Jamaica,
and has for its executive an appointee of the Governor of that Island.

There are no taxes except on dogs, horses and vehicles, no licenses except one to sell liquor by retail. But as the wants of the colony increase, a taxation system will have to be adopted. There is an excise duty of 50cts per gallon on distilled liquors, and 1cts on sugar. A uniform duty of 7 per cent is levied on all imports, save a few excepted articles, of which wine liquors and cigars are the only important ones. The currency is exclusively metallic. U. S. gold at a premium (fixed by law,) of 2 1/2 per cent.

As you may be aware, a large majority of the people are blacks,
but like our slaves, in former times,
they are simple, confiding and respectful in their intercourse with the whites. They are, as a class, far more honest and intelligent than the liberated slaves of the U. S. It must be confessed, that the Southerner will at first, experience a certain degree of repugnance, when he finds the negro raised to a certain extent to a quasi equality with himself. But let him suspend his judgment for a season, and he will learn that the equality is more apparent than real. Nowhere do social standing and intelligence have more weight than here. The negroes have been thrown into very intimate relations with foreigners of high rank,
which beside exercising a refining influence upon them, has taught them to venerate their social superiors. Like the old household servants of the South, they are keen to detect anything like under-breeding. But when the flood tide of emigration from the South fairly sets in, we can choose our society
among our friends and neighbors.
The day is not far distant, when a little colony of us will be peacefully settled on the shores of the Bay of Honduras, where the bucaniers of old hid their treasure rifled from the richly laden gal-lions, which course these seas. Bear in mind too, that with the solitary exception of Cuba, this quasi equality obtains all over the Continent.
I have seen and spoken with high dignitaries from our neighbors, the Spanish American Republics,
through whose veins coursed a blood far different from the sangre azul of the ancient Castilian, and then too these Spanish governments offer our people none of the guarantees of stability, enjoyed in British Honduras. Revolutions have become a chronic intermittent, and any one who studies
their history, cannot fail to conclude that with the present population they are irretrievable. The people may be divided into two classes, those in office and those out of office, and with a rapidly decreasing wealth, the struggle for the spoils will never cease, but only slumber.

As to the salubrity of this climate, not a doubt can be entertained, a single physician does more than half the practice of a town, more than twice as large as Aberdeen; one has only to glance at the splendid physical specimens of humanity, and the old people who have protracted their span to the limits of the centenarian, to be convinced that this must be a healthful clime. The lands of the Colony are owned almost exclusively by three or four wealthy commercial houses, who number their acres by millions.
Most of these immense tracts are almost totally uncultivated, as the industry of the Colony has been devoted alone to the cutting of the rich furniture and dye woods,
along the banks of the water courses; the mahogany cutter has penetrated but a short distance into the interior, which is now a virgin forest. Lands can be had at very reasonable rates, say 50c.
to $1, per acre. The house of people among us—J. C. Huckabee.

5. Presiding Eldership—T. S. Abernethy, Jr.
6. Camp Meetings—J. M. Gann.

Third. Resolutions on General Subjects.
Fourth. Miscellaneous Business.

The resolutions from DeKalb circuit relative to Sunday preaching for all our congregations and the better support of the preachers, were taken up and after a considerable discussion, laid over for the present, as it was thought best to await the meeting of Conference for action in the matter.

Dr. Spillman read an able report on the Relation of Children to the Church; in connection with which the following resolution was adopted:

Resolved, That Rev. Wm. Spillman be requested to enlarge and print in book form the excellent report on the Relation of Children to the Church; and that we pledge ourselves to give it as wide circulation as possible among our people.

The Committee on Sunday Schools from the Church in Meridian, consisting of
S. A. D. Steele, O. P. Thomas, and J. H.
Gibbs, presented and read their report,
which, after interesting remarks on the great value and interest of Sunday Schools,
was adopted, with the following resolution offered by S. H. Cox:

Resolved, That we, the members of this District Meeting, feeling Sunday Schools to be an interest of the first value and importance to our Church, do hereby pledge ourselves to use our best influence to permanently establish and build them up in our respective churches.

J. Bancroft, of Macon station, presented and read an able and eloquent report on the Duties of the Church Membership to the Ministry.

Pleading some interesting remarks on this subject by Wm. Spillman, the hour arrived and the Meeting adjourned, with the benediction by the Bishop.

SATURDAY 3 P. M.—Met at the appointed hour. Prayer by J. Bancroft. Morning minutes read and approved.

Rev. Dr. Kline, of the Presbyterian Church, was introduced and invited to a seat among us.

J. C. Huckabee reported on the Duties of the Church to the colored people among us.

On this subject interesting remarks were made by J. E. Newman, Judge Foote, Bishop Wightman, and others, tending to the edification of this Meeting, and instruction
as to duty in this direction.

The Meeting proceeded to the election of four Lay Delegates to next session of the Mobile Annual Conference. The following brethren were elected:

H. W. Foote, Macon station; A. K.
Ramsey, Gainesville; P. G. Nash, Livingston; W. G. Grace, Marion.

The subject of Camp Meetings being in order, J. M. Gann made a telling verbal report.

After interesting remarks on this subject
by Bishop Wightman, J. Bancroft, and others, the following, offered by J. M.
Gann, was adopted:

Resolved, That the members of this Meeting will have Camp Meetings on all the circuits where it is practicable to do so.

After resolutions of thanks, etc., the hour having arrived, the Meeting adjourned,
with the benediction of the Bishop.

Thos. S. ABERNETHY, Jr.,
Secretary.

BRITISH HONDURAS.

BELIZE, B. H., April 20, '67.

COL. JOHN B. SALE.

My Dear Sir:

I have been informed that you have done me the honor of addressing me a letter, which I am sorry to say, has not yet been received,
but as I can well understand that an interest in the great question of Southern emigration must have been uppermost in your mind when you penned it, I have taken the liberty of writing what may seem detailed and tedious, but what will,
I trust, at least awaken a curiosity
as to the home selected by some of your countrymen.

Having chosen this colony as my own abiding place, let me say a few words for its claims as a haven of refuge, and in so doing, I shall indulge in no flights of fancy, although this sunny land can scarce fail to awaken the dormant spirit of poetry, in the minds of the most prosaic. Facts, stern practical facts, shall be my text, and you may rely upon the accuracy of every word I write. I shall dream that I am in the witness box, subjected to a rigid cross examination, under the light of your severe but benign eye.

There can be but little doubt

at very reasonable rates, say 50c.
to $1, per acre. The house of

Young, Toledo & Co., offer gratis,
one hundred acres of very choice
lands to the actual settler.

Labor is abundant, especially at present, when mahogany cutting has been in a measure abandoned, but needs a directing intellect to apply it to agriculture, to which it is totally unaccustomed. Wages from $12, to $15 per month, and found. I have been told by Southern planters of experience, that three hands may be reckoned equal, fully, to two slaves, before the war. This deficiency is however more than compensated by the boundless fertility of the soil,
and by the fact, that most of the staples are perennial, and have not to be planted every year. This reduces the labor required, to a very considerable extent. Rice, corn, and all grains produce from two to five crops per annum. Sugar, equal to the grade of "Fair"
in the New Orleans market, is made with the rudest apparatus,
and sells, (excise paid,) at 2 to 6c.
per lb. Of the fertility of the soil,
you can have but little idea, unless you have visited the tropics. A bare enumeration of the crops will almost bewilder the mind; sugar,
cotton, coffee, cocoa, india rubber,
and cocoa nut oil are staples. To sum up: I claim for British Honduras, the following advantages over any of the Central and South American countries.

1st. A stable government.

2. Entire freedom of speech, religion and of the press, and security of life and property.

3. A common language, and a common faith.

4. A system of labor already established, which needs only to be turned into different channels.

5. A country more open and less encumbered with dense tropical vegetation.

6. The fact that it is one of the healthiest, if not the very healthiest locality on the Atlantic seaboard.

7. Speedy and easy communication with Europe and the U. S., and a ready market for produce,
steamers now run regularly once a month to New Orleans, and bring over crowds of prospecting Southerners, each trip.

If our countrymen could only realize what a glorious country
this is, with its virgin wealth of undeveloped resources, with eternal summer cooled by an ever blowing sea breeze, with its magnificent vegetation and unbounded fertility, where no freedman's bureau and military satraps lord it over a conquered people, where one hears the tinkle of real money,
where there are no taxes to pay,
nor stamps to affix;—if our countrymen, I say, could only know that such a land lay within six days sail from their shores, they would at least see it for themselves.

—Come over to us, and let us possess the goodly land.

But one thing we lack, and that is the wanted faces of our breth-

From the British Quarterly Review.

ARCHBISHOP WHATELY—HIS CLOSING LIFE.

The closing scenes of Whately's life are deeply touching. He preached the Gospel yet more eloquently in his death than in his life. Like other Christians, he had doubtless been slowly growing for many years; growing in knowledge, in self-knowledge, in humility, in charity, in elevation of thought and feeling; and yet we doubt not, that during the last year or two, and especially during his long and most painful illness, he struck his roots deeper and shot up higher, than during any other equal period of his life. He was like some plant of slow growth, but vigorous nature brought out of the chilly atmosphere into the hothouse; in that fierce heat, instead of drooping, and being repressed, he burst into tropical rapidity of growth, and put forth an unwonted luxuriance of leaf and flower. It is a phenomenon not seldom witnessed in the last scenes of a Christian's life. The process by which the child of dust is made meet for "the inheritance of the saints in light," by which this feeble plant is fitted for transplantation into the paradise of God, is at best a slow one. Long years of patient culture on the part of the Great Husbandman are expended upon it. Little and little, amidst many and humiliating lapses and failures, with line upon line, precept upon precept, and slow corrective discipline, are the habits formed and consolidated, by which man is fitted at last to be his own master in the highest sense; to become a denizen of any world to which the summons of God may call him; with all those habits of soul towards God and all God's creatures, which shall make him safe in the presence of all temptation; kept upright, not by bands and ligaments of outward constraint or artificial support, but by internal forces of moral equilibrium, by an intellect that can not, and a will that will not, see things other than they really are; and therefore safely poised from within; no statue of a man, set on a pedestal, and which, if a cramp or a nail give way, is at the mercy of the first breath that blows, but a living, conscious agent, with the power of adopting internal vital forces to the maintenance of equilibrium. The process, by which experience applied to self-discipline is to form that character, of which heaven will not be ashamed, and which will not be ashamed to find itself there—which will be greeted, not shunned, by the "innumerable company of angels," and the spirits of the just made perfect—is at best a slow one; nor is any mortal able (as Butler says) to pronounce, in relation to any individual, how long it is needful for the painful discipline to be continued in order to secure the result. The process by which the image of God is thus imprinted on the soul and wrought into it, is not like that which produces a photograph, struck off in a moment, impressed on perishable material, and laid in fading colors; but like that by which a great sculptor, slowly and by an infinite succession of touches, calls out of the solid marble a form of faultless grace and beauty; the tedious work of years, indeed, but worth all the labor, for it is to be immortal.

Though the change be in general so slow as often to elude observation, even in him who is the subject of it; or can only be discerned, and not always very clearly even then, by taking some years to enable us to make the comparison, yet there are times in the history of many Christians, and more frequently in the closing scenes of life, or under the pressure of long-continued affliction, when the religious character seems visibly to dilate and grow; when the soul seems, as it were, putting on the "beautiful garments" of its transfiguration, before "the body of its humiliation" has ceased to invest it, and to be unfolding its light Psyche wings before it has thrown off the chrysalis. Nor perhaps need we wonder that so signal an advance is reserved till the time of departure is at hand; often, indeed, it must be so. For some of the most important changes that are to be effected on the character of many a good Christian man before he can be said to be "perfected," must be deferred to the time when he has no work to do in active life. The very qualities which need the pruning or the fostering of that hour, may be so intertwined with other qualities essential to success during the active period of life, that they "grow together" as long as that period lasts. Energy is apt to pass into unseemly self-assertion, zeal to betray into anger or bigotry, self-reliance and independence into pride, arrogance, and contempt of others; yet these qualities can not be spared in the battle of life; when that is over, and when they can no longer be used here, they are purified from alloy. The excesses and defects observable in many, however inseparably connected with qualities which fit them to be of great service in the world, nevertheless need to be corrected like every other, and so, when a man's life-work is done, and he can be himself the exclusive object of discipline, God seems to bring him into his inner school, and teaches him, as no other teacher can, and by strange methods, the remaining lessons which, once learned, are to issue in freedom from all painful discipline forever; teaches him above all, that childlike resignation to the will of God, that absorption of soul in Him, that deep, inextinguishable trust in His goodness, in spite of His chastisements, which are the hardest lessons of all. When those habits of soul are fully formed, then shall we be enabled to bear, what it is clear we can not bear here, cloudless happiness and never changing prosperity.

In the case of the good Archbishop, it is not difficult to believe that several traits of his character, which though allied to virtue, and "leading to virtue's side"—perhaps inseparable from his energetic nature, and even serviceable in the work he was called upon to do in the world—needed the "refiner's fire" before the "Refiner" himself (according to the beautiful image of the prophet) saw his own perfect image there, after which he might let the fire slacken and the furnace go out forever. Certain it is, that the picture which his last days present to us is a very impressive one. The "strong man" was now become "as a little child," patience, gentleness, and humility had their "perfect work;" and above all, he fully realized and bore his testimony to the practical value and reality of those great truths of the Gospel, which in all of us, while we are in health and prosperity, are too apt to shine as a clear, cold light in the understanding, without kindling a proportionable flame in the heart.

We insert a brief extract from the records of his last days. Mr. Dickinson writes: "His sufferings increased each day, and he felt very painfully his inability to come into town for the discharge of business. His 'usefulness,' as he called it, was the 'special trial' to his active spirit. One day, early in August, when I went out to see him, on my entering his study, he looked up, and said, with tears in his eyes, 'Have you ever preached a sermon on the text, 'Thy will be done?' How did you explain it?' When I replied, 'Just so,' he said, 'that is the meaning,' and added, in a voice choked with tears, 'but it is hard, very hard, sometimes to say it.'"

We again quote from the memoranda of Mr. Dickinson, who constantly took notes of an illness so affecting to all Whately's friends. In these notes we see the veil of reserve somewhat lifted, which hitherto had made the inner life a mystery—hidden even from those nearest to him.

"Through life he had stood forward as a powerful defender of the Christian faith, and now it was to be shown to all how the same simple trust in Christ as the only Saviour, which has smoothed so many a humble death-bed, was to be the stay and staff of the mighty thinker and writer while crossing 'the valley of the shadow of death.'"

"Sept. 12. This morning I read for the Archbishop the 69th Psalm. His appetite grows worse. When his dinner was brought he said, 'Oh, how I loathe the thought of eating!' Yet in these little things he shows very strongly the habit of forcing all his inclinations and actions under the rule of reason; and he is so considerate for others—fearful of giving trouble. When he could scarcely bring himself to eat, he said to his attached servant, who seemed distressed, 'But pray do not think I am finding fault; I know the fault is in myself.' It has been extremely difficult to move him from the sofa to the bed; and it is touching to see how he tries to control the outward expression of suffering, lest he should cause distress to those about him. While the perspiration streamed down his face in agony, he restrained every murmur of impatience, and said to us repeatedly, 'Yes—yes, I know you do all you can. The pain can not be helped.' During the night I heard him often murmur, 'Lord have mercy on me. Oh, my God, grant me patience.'"

"Sunday, Sept. 13. This morning he looked as though his last hour had been drawing near. About one o'clock a friend standing near said, 'This is death.' Supposing that all was over, one of his daughters stooped down and kissed his forehead. He awoke, and in the confusion of sudden waking said, with a little nervous irritation, 'Oh, you should never wake an invalid.' Some time afterwards he sent for his daughter, and said, 'I am afraid I spoke petulantly just now. I am very sorry for it—I beg your pardon.' If ever the fruits of the Spirit—'gentleness, patience'—were manifest in any one, they are in him! In the afternoon he was rather better. Archdeacon West, his domestic chaplain, came out and read prayers with him. He said, 'Read me the eighth chapter of Romans.' When Dr. West had finished the chapter, he said, 'Shall I read any more?' 'No, that is enough at a time. There is a great deal for the mind to dwell on in that.' He dwelt especially on the thirty-second verse: 'He that spared not his own Son.' In the very last sermon he had preached, he had enlarged on this as the conclusive and satisfactory proof that afflictions were sent not in anger, but in love; and he now recalled, for his own comfort, the turn of thought by which he had so lately tried to comfort others. He had had this chapter read to him frequently during his illness.

"On the 14th of September he received the Lord's Supper. It was a scene never to be forgotten by any one who witnessed it. A calm, earnest attention and solemn peace reigned on his face; he spoke little, but evidently the soul was communing with God. A little before this, one of his friends in attendance on him had remarked that his great mind was supporting him; his answer, most emphatically and earnestly given, was, 'No, it is not that which supports me; it is faith in Christ. The life I live is by Christ alone.'"

Sept. 15th. This morning his son read to him the 4th chapter of the 2d of Corinthians. He followed the chapter with tears and silent prayer, and at the end pronounced an emphatic amen. Towards evening he said, 'This has been a terrible day. Oh, the tenacity of life is a great trial. Do pray for my release, if it be God's will.'"

"Sept. 16th. After breakfast I read to him Hebrews xi. He was much moved, and when I ended said with emphasis, 'Every chapter in the Bible you read seems as if it were written on purpose for me.'"

"Sunday, Sept. 27th. In the evening there was a hemorrhage from the leg. A messenger was immediately dispatched into town for the physician. He lay quite calm and still, asking, after ten minutes, 'Is the bleeding still going on?' I hope so. He evidently felt thankful, believing that his release was near. The bleeding had greatly abated before the doctor arrived. When he came in he said, 'I think we can stop it, my lord.' The Archbishop answered, in his old natural manner, 'I am afraid so.' When the doctor left, having succeeded in stopping the hemorrhage, the Archbishop said to me, 'Is not this a very unusual hour for the doctor to come?' I answered, 'Yes, but we sent for him expressly when the bleeding began.' And he replied, 'Oh, you had not told me of that. Did you suppose I was afraid to die?'"

"Oct. 1st. This morning he listened attentively while several Psalms were read to him. He was moaning very restlessly, in the night, and once when I went to his bedside and asked, 'Is there anything you wish for, my lord?' he answered, 'I wish for nothing but death.' It was on the night following this that another of his chaplains was watching beside him, and in making some remark expressive of sympathy with his distressing sufferings and helplessness, quoted the words from Phil. iii, 21, 'Who shall change our vile body.' The Archbishop interrupted him with the request, 'Read the words.' His attendant read them from the English Bible; but he reiterated, 'Read his own words.' The chaplain, not being able to find the Greek Testament at the moment, repeated from memory the literal translation, 'This body of our humiliation.' 'That's right,' interrupted the Archbishop, 'not vile—nothing that He made is vile.'"

With these records of his last hours before us, we have no heart and as little need, to ascertain the exact whereabouts, the precise latitude and longitude of his theological position. Whether, as is often said, his religion was of a too intellectual cast—whether any of his opinions had a "cold, rationalistic tendency"—whether he was a bigot to a "narrow and rigid orthodoxy"—whether he was deficient in the "aesthetic" elements of religion, and wanting in "reverence"—whether he was semi-heretical in the article of the Trinity, we shall not discuss; but one thing is plain, that he had now got not only beyond "cold rationalism," but beyond "cold orthodoxy" too; and that if religion, with him (doubtless from his undemonstrative nature), had the appearance of dwelling in the head only, it is plain that it had taken full possession of his heart.

HENS.—By warmth and judicious feeling, says Mr. Bement, a hen may be made to lay as many eggs in two years, as she would under ordinary circumstances in three; and every one knows, or ought to know, that a fowl fatted at two years old is much more tender and palatable, than one that is older.

FREE SPEECH INTERDICTION.

There was a time when it was at the risk of a man's life to discuss certain subjects south of Mason & Dixon's Line. It is but a few years since the right of discussing the slavery question was denied in the Southern States. Now, however, without fear of molestation, such men as Senator Wilson, Messrs. Kelley and Nye—the most radical of their class—can go all over the South and discuss the great questions of the day.

This state of things had led us to hope that the right of free speech was recognized in every State of the Union. In this, however, we are sadly disappointed. A week or two since a Rev. Mr. White announced that he would deliver a lecture, on a certain night, in Quincy, Ills., on the subject of Romanism, and engaged a hall for that purpose. Prior to the hour appointed for the lecture to commence, the hall was taken possession of by the Roman Catholics, and, on his attempting to speak, Mr. White was summarily ejected from the house. It is said that at least two thousand persons were present, inside and outside the building, armed with clubs, stones, and other missiles. The Mayor of the city was appealed to disperse the mob and protect the lecturer, but the appeal was made in vain. The Mayor responded that "the people had rights as well as the speaker." A strange answer for the Mayor of an American city to give. It in effect declared that the lecturer had no rights, and the mob might do as they pleased. The result of the matter was that the Rev. J. C. White "barely escaped lynching."—United Presbyterian.

From "Good Words."

The Son Fretting against the Restraints of his Home.

"Yea, hath God said, Ye shall not eat of every tree of the Garden?"—Genesis iii. 1.

"The son of Adam, which was the Son of God," is the climax, in St. Luke's Gospel, of the human genealogy of Jesus. Adam was, in right of creation—a right as yet clear and unforfeited—a son of God. And this son, like other sons, had a home—a home in the blessed Paradise, watered by its four streams, and enlightened by a supernatural Presence. And that home, like other homes, had its restraints as well as its blessings. There stood just one tree in the very midst of the garden, concerning which it was said to him, "Thou shalt not eat of it. In the day that thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die." And the text tells how there arose—we know not whether late or early, for the flight of years is unmarked in the paradisaical blessedness—a fretting of this son against the restraints, against this one restraint, of his home; how the fallen spirit used this as the engine of his first assault upon man's innocence, making him ponder the fact and question the reasonableness of this single prohibition by which the Almighty Father asserted his sovereignty over the child whom He had formed and the earth which He had created.

Thus the third chapter of the Bible furnishes the appropriate text for our present meditation, of which the thesis is—

The Son fretting against the Restraints of his Home.

His Home. The word Home is full of restful thoughts and tender associations. The family, of which home is the center, is God's primary and original ordinance. There was a family before there was a state; there was a family before there was a Church. Out of family life grew naturally all other modes of being—social, civil, political, ecclesiastical. For long ages the family was the Church; and the birthright of the firstborn included the priesthood and the intercession. If the stream of civilization should ever flow back upon itself—if factitious inequalities should be levelled, political institutions overthrown, the Church itself (so far as it rests upon outward supports) demolished and done away—there would still be the source and spring of all, so long as there is the Home; there might man still love, and there might the universal Father still be worshipped.

Even as it is, while the complications of society continue as we have them, the deepest of all truths, the most real of all facts, the most stable and solid of all relations, is that of the family, that of the home. It begins earlier, it strikes deeper, it penetrates more thoroughly the whole fabric of the being, than any other influence or any other reality. If a home is corrupt, woe to the life! If a father's character, if a mother's example, can not be depended upon, where is the new cruse, where is the healing salt, which shall give back its sparkling vitality to that spring of the waters? Even without this worst supposition, who has not noticed the injurious effect upon a young life, upon the character of a man throughout life, to have had, from circumstances, no home—to have been deprived, by death, or by a separation like death, of the enjoyment of the use of the possession of a home?

Children, young men, grown men, value your homes! Give God daily thanks for them. Little do you know—for these are blessings seldom appreciated till they are withdrawn—all that is contained for you—all of safety, all of happiness, all of blessing—within the four walls of your home.

But now this Home, of which such glorious things are spoken, and of which we have not told one-thousandth part of its mercies—this home is a society, this home is a polity, is a little state, is a little church. Then, like other societies, it must have its rules; like other polities, it must have its laws. And rules are restraints. They are, so far as they go, limitations upon the self-will. They are conditions upon which alone the benefits of the community can be enjoyed. Where is the home which has no laws? which imposes no restrictions upon its members—whether natural members, the children—or acquired and temporary, like its hired servants? That home can not be safe; that home can not be happy. There must be restraints upon the free will of each, if there is to be any security, or if there is to be any comfort, for the body, which is the whole. In these days it is the fashion to relax rules. Homes try to dispense with restraints. Each child, from the first beginning of speech, is to express his own opinion: each child, from the first power of motion, is to do his own will. Entreaty replaces command, and persuasion supersedes authority. Does happiness result from this sort of freedom? If there was once too much of distance between the parents and the children, may there not well be too little? Is it to be desired that the father and his son should (as it is sometimes avowed, sometimes even boasted) live together like brothers? This is an inversion of God's order; and God's order can never be changed without mischief and without suffering. In place of authority, plainly asserted and gravely maintained, there will always grow up something else; something more unequal, more uncertain, more trying and irritating, therefore, to all; hasty snatchings of the reins from time to time, as temper, or caprice, or experience of inconvenience, may dictate: and thus the self-will, which might have been gradually disciplined into obedience, kicks against the sudden goad of an occasional interference; and the son, who would have borne the light burden and easy yoke of an equable subordination, frets against the unexpected thwartings of a restraint at once violent and unprincipled.

But our present subject should remind us rather of a fretting against home restraints, which has no such excuse to palliate it. It does happen—such is fallen nature—even to a wise and loving father, to have, in the best of homes, an unamiable and a disobedient son. There is a vast difference—who can gainsay it?—between the natural dispositions, tempers, and temptations of different persons. In one point of view, this is a great mystery. Where is the equality of God's government, even in moral and spiritual things? Where is that reconciling, harmonizing principle which shall make compensation for what we can not but call the diverse advantages of one and another, even for obedience, even for morality, even for salvation? We must leave these questions in the hands of God. "Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?" "Shall the thing formed say to Him that formed it, Why hast Thou made me thus?" This we know already—that no one need be wickeder. The struggle may seem to be more severe for one than for another; but God "giveth more grace" as man needs more, and will most surely give enough of His grace to every one who asks Him.

Meanwhile every home has its restraints, and the undutiful son frets against them. He is impatient of its indirect, unexpressed, understood restrictions. He feels him self ill at ease in that presence in which an irreverent expression would be an insult, and an impure jest an impossibility; in which, whatever he may be elsewhere, he can not possibly introduce any thing or any person but that which is decent and honorable and of good report. And he is impatient also of its more direct rules. What is the use, he asks, of this punctuality of hours, this enforcement of particular times for meals and prayers, for resting and rising; this displeasure at an occasional lateness; this rigid compulsion of my presence within doors before a certain striking of the clock at evening? Am I not old enough—and the question is asked early—to have a little control over my own going and coming, over my presence here or there, over my companionships and choice of friends? Another, whom I know, is not thus watched and guarded; why should I particularly be thus under suspicion and inspection? Surely it is time that I should be more trusted; nay—for such is the addition sometimes made to the argument of the self-deceiver—it would be better even for the development of my character that I should be more let alone.

And so it comes to pass, year after year, in the million homes of England, that the story of the sacred Parable is again and again acted: the son says to his father, in thought if not in words, Give me my portion and let me begone! the days of childhood are past; the time of self-reliance, the time of liberty and independence, is come! O, we often hear it—and always, whether it be said in words, or only shown in the manner, in the look, in the tell-tale countenance, whenever we perceive it, we tremble!

It is the fashion of the times to indulge this spirit. From an early age, in many towns, the son only lodges with his parents; pays his rent, pays for his board, like any stranger; and if a word of reproval or remonstrance is uttered, will even change his lodging and begone! the son frets against the restraints of his home, and if these restraints be reduced to a mere shadow, he will rebel against them and he will resent them still.

But was it then for the sake of a discourse on family life—its blessings, its trials, and its sorrows—that we chose the subject now before us? These things are an allegory. What we see in human homes is a type of what God sees in the great human home every day. And thus we find ourselves in the very heart of a deeply spiritual subject, through which may God guide us to some serious reflections, and to an earnest amendment of life.

ALL IS OVER.—The great suspense which has filled the hearts and minds of our people has at last been relieved. The injunction case has at last been thrown out of Court for want of jurisdiction. This was thought evident from the tenor of Attorney-General Stanbery's argument. Those who have been waiting to see the end are now satisfied that a Constitution, a President, or a Supreme Court, cannot withstand the encroaching menaces of Radicalism. All are like straws before the wind. It is a painful admission that the Government to which we were taught to look for protection and relief, is no longer in existence. It is in the last stages of dissolution. And soon the fearful and terrible realities of anarchy will rush upon us, and all that was noble and worthy, and good, will be swept away before the whirlwind of passion and fanaticism. The only hope is with the people, and we must confess that as an individual, this is very weak. The same populace who sing hosannas to-day, will cry on to-morrow, "away with him, crucify him, crucify him!" The duty, however, of action is none the less binding. We should seize upon the opportunities granted by the bill of the storm, and come forward and register, and prepare to vote, and it possible, to save something out of the general wreck. He who stands aloof in this hour of peril, surrounds all.

It is true, as one of the great minds of the age has said, "that one revolution plants the seed for another." By the decision of the Supreme Court, the people of the South stand justified before the world in their appeal to arms. By their action they have made rebellion honorably, not odious. No less an individual than Caleb Cushing, speaking of New England and her malignant spirit, says: "Proud in the hour of triumph over her ancient but now fallen foe, and while the South is now a prostrate country, lying like a headless body exposed to the spur of the passer-by, New England has too reins, and while she holds them she will drive roughshod over the conquered States, and place the cup she has prepared even to the lips of her hitherto Northern allies. But the hour cometh," says General Cushing, "when the awakening people of the West, who have in the past followed the lead of the East, will assert that strength whose irresistible power is to control this country."—Galveston Weekly News.

Chambers's Journal notices among recent American inventions a photographic cigar-holder. "It is cleverly made of paper and quill, and is ornamented with a blank medallion, which, however, becomes filled with a photograph when the heat of the smoke develops the picture, but in what way has not yet been made known. The cost of the article is trifling, and it affords a curious instance of the uses to which photography may be put."

From the Montgomery Mail. METHODIST PROTESTANT CONVENTION.

On the third day (Friday) of the session the following paper was presented by the Commissioners of the M. E. Church South:

MONTGOMERY, ALA., May 6, 1867.

To the Convention of the Methodist Protestant Church:

BRETHREN: The General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, held in New Orleans, adopted, May 3, 1866, the following resolution:

"Resolved, That a Commission, consisting of five members of this body and two Bishops, be appointed to confer with a Commission, if one be appointed from the General Conference of the Methodist Protestant Church, now in session in Georgetown, D. C., on the subject of a union between the Methodist Protestant Church and the Methodist Episcopal Church South, with power to settle terms of union."

Accordingly the following Commissioners were appointed:

Bishops Pierce and McTear, Rev. C. F. Deems, J. E. Evans, S. Register, N. Head, and L. M. Lee. For the official documents, we refer you to a copy of the Journal of Conference herewith submitted. This action was communicated to your General Conference, and in reply we were officially notified that that body had received and considered the same, and also had provided for a Convention to be called at this time and place, at which the aforesaid Commissioners were invited to be present.

This is to inform you that we are now here, and ready to confer with you, at such time as you may please to set, on the subject indicated in the resolution under which we were appointed.

Hoping for an issue favorable to the unity and prosperity of our common Methodism, and the increase of Christ's Kingdom, and praying for the guidance of the Holy Spirit, we are yours fraternally.

GEORGE F. PIERCE,
Chairman.

After the formal introduction of our Commissioners and speeches by them, the following resolution was adopted:

"Resolved, That we extend our cordial greeting to Rev. Bishop Pierce, Rev. Bishop McTear, Rev. Leroy M. Lee, D.D., and Rev. James E. Evans, Commissioners from the Methodist Episcopal Church South, to this body—that we warmly welcome them to a place in our assembly, and heartily reciprocate the sentiments of Christian affection and regard which they have expressed—that while we rejoice in this fraternal interchange as the means of cementing the bonds of brotherly love, and promoting unity of spirit among the members of Christ's body, we agree with them that a visible union of the two branches of the great family of Methodism, represented respectively by them and us, is most desirable, if such a union can be effected on terms mutually agreeable."

Resolved, That one minister and one lay commissioner from each District represented in this Convention, be elected by the delegates from their respective Districts to confer with the Commission of our sister Church on the subject of their embassy.

Saml. K. Cox,
B. F. Duggan.

The next day the Commissioners were appointed by the Convention. We gave their names last week.

On Monday, 13th, the following papers were reported to the Convention:

To the Commissioners of the Methodist Protestant Church:

BRETHREN: The Commissioners of the M. E. Church South submit to you the following proposition: We propose a formal and corporate union of the Methodist Episcopal Church South and the Methodist Protestant Church. The separation originally took place because Lay Representation was denied. This principle being now conceded and incorporated into the economy of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, we thought there was no insuperable bar to such union of the two bodies respectively represented by us.

We propose a union with your ministers, itinerant and local, and your members, each in their several relations, and entitled to all the rights and privileges common to our own ministers and members, under the discipline of the M. E. Church South.

Geo. F. Pierce,
H. N. McTear,
J. E. Evans,
Leroy M. Lee.

Montgomery, May 10, 1867.

This proposition was responded to by the Methodist Protestant Church in the following propositions of the Commission of the Methodist Protestant Church to the Commission of the M. E. Church South:

TERMS OF UNION.
1st. Strike out of the Church name the word "South."

2d. If "Episcopal" to be retained in the name, Protestant to be incorporated.

3d. Dispose with the Presiding Eldership.

4th. Have as many Bishops as Annual Conferences.

5th. In the election of new Bishops, what are now our Annual Conferences shall have the privilege of nominating from their present members their first Bishops, and the General Conference shall elect such nominees.

6th. Itinerant ministers to have the right of appeal from the stationing power.

7th. Maryland Conference, in the event of union, to be allowed to decide upon its own name, ministerial membership, and boundaries, provided said boundaries be not extended farther south than the States of Maryland and Delaware and the District of Columbia and the station in Alexandria.

8th. Our system of trial of accused ministers and members, or its equivalent.

9th. No minister to be transferred from one Conference to another without his own consent and the consent of the Conference to which he is to be transferred.

10th. Local preachers and ministers to be put upon a par with itinerant preachers and ministers, in regard to qualifications for eligibility to orders.

11th. Local ministers to be alike eligible with itinerant ministers to a seat in the General Conference.

12th. Each station, circuit, and mission, to be allowed one delegate in the Annual Conference; in the former to be elected by the male members, in the two latter, by the Quarterly Conference.

13th. No veto power to be conceded to the Bishops.

14th. Incorporate in the Discipline the following: (Art. 8, sec. 5) The Ministry and Laymen shall deliberate in one body; but, if upon the final passage of any question, it be required by three members, the ministers and laymen shall vote separately, and the concurrence of a majority of both classes of representatives shall be necessary to constitute a vote of the Conference.

A similar regulation shall be observed in the Annual Conference.

15th. In the Annual Conference, the laity shall have the right to participate in all the business, except such as relate to trial of ministers and preachers.

A Response of the Commissioners of the M. E. Church to the Commissioners of the Methodist Protestant Church:

1st. The late General Conference, by a two-thirds vote, recommended a change in the name and style of our church that left off the word "South," in deference to those who were embarrassed by it, and because circumstances had, to a considerable extent, caused its history and significance to be lost sight of. The motion of the General Conference was submitted to the Annual Conference, which gave an aggregate of 1,168 in favor of concurrence and 409 against, lacking but little of the three-fourths vote, upon which its passage was conditioned.

2d. There would result inconvenience and inharmoniousness of title from this, and also, incongruity for lay representation having been conceded, the denial of which was the principal ground of your original protest, there remains nothing against which to protest, inasmuch as you accept Episcopacy.

3d. The number of Bishops which our policy at present maintains, and has maintained, makes the Presiding Eldership indispensable for the care of all the churches, and a thorough and effective oversight of the whole work. We add, this is a question of legislation, and the General Conference, as now constituted, will doubtless represent the sense of the ministry and laity on the subject.

4th. The Church, as a whole, has not favored this policy. Many wise and influential ministers among us do. At the late General Conference the number of effective Bishops was increased by more than a hundred per cent., and not a few advocate the view you present. The tendency is, we believe, to the increase of Bishops.

5th. We have no power to make such a stipulation. We doubt not that, in a General Conference of the united Church, a fair and even a liberal course would be pursued. More, perhaps, would be gained in this respect by confidence than by contract.

6th. Upon this point our Church is decided; our executive system could not admit the proposed modification; it would, as we believe, embarrass the itinerancy, and deprive it of that promptness and efficiency requisite to meet the moral demands of our times and country. The proposed appeal of the itinerant minister, from the appointing power, if he does not like the charge to which he is sent, would seem unequal unless the same right be given to the people, if they do not like the preacher sent to them, and this would destroy the itinerancy.

Moreover, the itinerant ministers are protected by our law, at the point you would guard. He can decline to accept his appointment, and throw himself upon the Conference at its next session to sustain him; (see Dis. p. 120) for any oppression, he has redress by complaint to the General Conference, which is open to him, and to which the Bishop is amenable. While the whole legislative power was in the hands of itinerant ministers they did not find it necessary to provide any other protection for themselves.

7th. This can best be settled by the parties at interest. The General Conference has granted to the Baltimore and Virginia Conferences a discretionary power which may be used for the settlement.

8th. No difficulty here. As we understand the system of the two Churches, there is no substantial difference.

9th. While our Church has not found it expedient to restrict the Episcopal prerogative, at this point, by formal legislation, the usage is, and has been, not to transfer a minister from one Conference to another without his consent.

As respects the Conference, experience satisfies us that a large discretion must be allowed on this subject in order to carry out the objects of an itinerant General Superintendency, and to meet the wants of a varied and extensive field.

10th. We have no authority to meet this condition, but we do not hesitate to say that we approve it as a measure, and that the tendency of the Church is in this direction.

11th. The principle of their eligibility is recognized in our existing law, and provision made whereby a fair proportion of representatives may be secured. Any further extension of this provision may be safely left to the future legislation of the General Conference.

12th. In addition to the foregoing, so far as it applies to this case, we submit, that in our Church, and more still, if the proposed union take place—the stations, circuits, and missions would be so numerous as to render the Annual Conferences which are executive bodies, cumbersome and unwieldy for business and of inconvenient size for accommodation.

13th. This matter is beyond our control. Whether the power exist in the Episcopacy, or shall be conceded or limited, is a mooted question, and rests with the Church.

14th. This provision, touching the General Conference, is in our law, save that it requires one-fifth of the members for a separation of the vote. Its application to the Annual Conference would, in our opinion, for various reasons, be embarrassing without any compensating advantage.

15th. This may, with propriety and safety, be left to a general Conference, composed equally of ministers and laymen.

The subjoined reports of the Commissioners major, minor, and sub-minor were presented to the Convention:

MAJORITY REPORT OF THE COMMISSIONERS OF THE M. E. CHURCH.

To the Convention of the Methodist Protestant Church:

The undersigned, a majority of the Commissioners appointed to confer with the Commission of the M. E. Church South, in relation to a corporate union between the two Churches, beg leave to report that, duly impressed with the importance of the subject of their trust, they have given it the most serious, patient, and prayerful consideration, and now submit the following paper as the result which they have reached:

The Convention has indicated by its resolution welcoming the Commissioners of the M. E. Church South among us, its willingness to unite on terms agreeable to both Churches. The Commission of the M. E. Church South, however, have not felt themselves authorized to offer such terms as we believe would be acceptable to all the members of our Church, and we do not feel authorized to modify, essentially, the conditions we have proposed.

Therefore, resolved, that the whole subject be referred for final action to our several Annual Conferences, and that the Presidents thereof be requested to announce the result to the Commissioners of the M. E. Church South, expressing the hope that the Conference may act as a unit.

Your Commission can not conclude their report without expressing their highest appreciation of the pleasure afforded them by their several interviews with their brother Commissioners of the M. E. Church South. They have conducted themselves towards us with a kindness of manner, a Christian candor, cordiality, and confidence which, whatever may be the result of our official intercourse at this Convention, will give them a place in our hearts as brethren beloved in the Lord.

To place the Convention in possession of all that has occurred between the two Commissions, we submit the three several papers which accompany this report.

MINORITY REPORT.

We, the subscribing Commissioners appointed by the Convention to meet the Commissioners of the M. E. Church South, and receive from them propositions looking to a union of the Methodist Protestant Church with said denomination, have performed that duty, and with a sacred regard to the great cause of Christianity and of Methodism ask to submit this, a minority report.

That the conditions of union, submitted by the venerable Commission of the M. E. Church, have been considered carefully by us, and, while we agree with the majority of the Commission that all the members of the Church will not be satisfied with them; yet, feeling convinced that a large majority will cheerfully accept these terms which we regard as liberal, hopeful, and indicative of an early affirmation of all the points of difference between them, therefore, we cordially accept them and recommend to our Annual Conferences action in harmony with our acceptance.

P. H. NAPIER.

SECOND MINORITY REPORT.

The undersigned, a Commissioner from the N. C. District, and dissenting from a single feature of the majority report, submits the following:

That the point from which he dissents is the recommendation of the committee to refer the question to the Annual Conferences. The undersigned does not agree to abide the decision of the Conferences without the concurrence of at least a majority of the membership of the several Annual Conferences.

W. H. WILLS.

The following was offered as a substitute for all the papers reported by the Commission:

Resolved 1st. That we hereby express our highest appreciation of the Christian candor and courtesy with which the Commissioners of the M. E. Church South have presented the subject of their mission to this Convention, and to the Commission appointed to confer with them.

Resolved 2d. That we recognize with grateful joy the present occasion as a most auspicious event in the history of Methodism, when the prejudices and animosities of the past have been so far forgotten and laid aside as that the representatives of the two branches of the Methodist family, long and unhappily divided, have been brought together in council to discuss terms of union between their respective Churches.

Resolved 3d. That while we regard the proposed union as highly desirable both for the interests of Methodism and of our common Christianity, this Convention does not deem it expedient or proper to take authoritative action, binding the Conferences here represented to any particular course upon this subject, inasmuch as these several Conferences are variously affected by local causes and influences, but would refer the whole subject for final decision to each Annual Conference.

Saml. K. Cox,
B. S. Bunn.

We have not received a full report of all the action of the Convention. It seems that, after discussion, a special Committee was raised, consisting of S. K. Cox, W. H. Wills, J. Bass, J. K. Nichols, J. G. Cherry, E. Harrison, P. H. Napier, and C. W. Burton, to whom all the papers were submitted. This Committee reported and their report was discussed, amended, and finally adopted, as follows:

The Committee to whom were referred the several papers on the subject of union between the Methodist Protestant Church and the Methodist Episcopal Church South, have had the same under consideration, and respectfully report:

That they regard the proposed union as highly desirable both for the interest of Methodism and of our common Christianity, if it can be effected upon terms mutually agreeable; that although a portion of the Church, as we are advised, is prepared at this time to conclude the union on the terms proposed; yet, inasmuch as an honest difference of opinion exists among us, in this respect, and no decision can be reached by this body at its present session that will insure harmony and united action, we, therefore, respectfully recommend—

1st. That the Convention take no decisive action at this time; but that the whole subject be held in abeyance and under advisement by the several Annual Conferences, calmly awaiting the development and indications of Providence.

2d. That a Commission consisting of one member from each Conference here represented, elected by each delegation in this Convention, be appointed to meet the Commission of the M. E. Church South, on the first day of May, 1868; in the meantime the several Annual Conferences of the M. E. Church South and the M. P. Church may consider as many of the disagreeing propositions between the two Commissions of the M. E. Church South and the M. P. Church as they may deem proper, and submit the result to their respective Commissions. Then if a majority of the Commissioners of the M. P. Church decide that, in their judgment, the propositions submitted to them are sufficiently favorable, they shall publish in the Methodist Protestant newspaper a call for this Convention to meet in the city of Lynchburg on the last Friday in May, 1868, and, if it seems it proper, to conclude any proposed union.

Resolved, That any Annual Conference properly connected with the M. P. Church, not represented here, be requested to appoint one Commissioner to meet with this Commission.

Resolved, That in the event of the death or other disability of any of the Commissioners herein appointed, the Delegation of the respective Annual Conferences here represented be authorized to fill the vacancy.

The Commissioners of the M. E. Church South took formal leave of the Convention during the evening session of Thursday. Each addressed the Convention in a few brief remarks expressing the gratification this intercourse had afforded them, and thanking the Convention for the kindness with which they had been entertained during the process of negotiation. They were responded to in the characteristic dignified and affectionate style of the President, Dr. J. J. Murray.

The Convention were then allowed a few moments recess, and a warm sympathetic shaking of hands ensued.

"So endeth the reading of the first lesson." [En.]

CONQUERING FAITH.

But two instances are recorded in which Jesus passed an approving judgment, and looked with admiring regard upon the faith of those who came to him; and it is remarkable that they are those of the two Gentiles—the Roman Centurion and the Syro-Phœnician woman. "Verily," said he of the one, "I have not found so great faith, no, not in Israel!"

"Woman," said he to the other, "great is thy faith!" Great faith was needed in those who were the first to force the barrier that ages had thrown up between Jew and Gentile, and great faith in these instances was displayed. Of the two, however, that of the purely Gentile woman was the highest in its character and the noblest in its achievements.

The Roman's faith was in the unlimitedness of Christ's power—a power he believed so great that even as he said to his soldiers, "Go!" and they went; "Come!" and they came; "Do this!" and they did it—so could Jesus say to disease and life and death; pouring at a distance a saving, by the simple word of his power! The faith of the Canaanite was not simply in the unlimitedness of Christ's power. His power she never for a moment doubted. He had no reason to say to her, Believest thou that I am able to do this? By his willingness he gave her himself some reason to doubt. Thousands placed as she was would have doubted—thousands tried, as she was, have failed. Which of us has a faith in Jesus of which we are quite sure that it would come through such a conflict unscathed? In her it never seems for a moment to have faltered. In front of his mysterious, unexplained silence; of the explanation given of that silence that appeared to exclude beneath the sentence that assigned her a place among the dogs; her faith lived on, with a power in it to penetrate the folds of that dark mantle which the Lord for a short season drew around him—to know and see that behind the assumed veil of coldness, silence, indifference, repulse, reproach, there beat the willing, loving heart, upon whose boundless benevolence she casts herself, trusting, and not afraid. This was her confidence, that there was more love in that heart to her than the outward conduct of Jesus might seem to indicate. It was that confidence which sustained her from first to last. It was that confidence which carried her over all the obstructions thrown successively before her. It was that confidence which sharpened her wit, and gave her courage to snatch out of Christ's own hand the weapon by which her last and greatest victory was won. It was that confidence in him, in spite of all adverse appearances, which pleased the Lord so much—for he likes, as we all do, to be trusted in—

—and which drew from him the unwonted expression at once of approval and admiration, "O woman, great is thy faith!" It is the same kind of simple trust in Jesus that we need; and in us, too, if we but had it in like degree, it would accomplish like blessed results. What the silence and the sentences of Jesus were to that entreating woman, crying after Jesus to have her dealings, in providence and in grace, are to us crying after him for the healing of our own or others' spiritual maladies. We cry, but he answers not a word; we entreat, but he turns upon us a frowning countenance; when he speaks, his words seem to cut us off from comfort and from help. But deal as we may with us, hide himself, as he may, speak roughly as he may, let us still believe that there beats in that heart of the Redeemer a love to us, upon which we can at all times cast ourselves in full unbounded trust.

"Woman, great is thy faith; do it unto thee even as thou wilt." And her daughter was made whole from that very hour.—Dr. Harnay, in Sunday Magazine.

IRON.—It is said that Mr. Bessemer now enjoys from his patents for the conversion of iron into steel, the princely income of $500,000 a year.—Messrs. Fairbanks, of St. Johnsbury, Vt., the original inventors of the platform scales, although no longer protected by patents, melt up in their manufacture over thirteen tons of iron per day, and shipped from their works, during ten days in April, 2,923 boxes of scales, weighing over 232 tons.

They are about occupying a new foundry which is one of the completest in the country.—Notwithstanding the prohibitory law, now so energetically pushed in Massachusetts, about 150 hands are employed at East Bridgewater in the manufacture of gins, which were exported to the cotton States, Brazil, etc., to the amount of $500,000 last year.—A very heavy compressing machine is building at Poughkeepsie for the Hudson River Paper Company. The metal used in it weighs 200 tons, several of the castings weighing one to seven tons each. It will be driven by an engine of 100 horse-power.—A company has been organized at Albany for the manufacture of Youngs' patent car-truck, in which the axles adjust themselves at all times at right angles to the track and radially to the curves.—A new manufacturing is building at Norwich, Conn.—Russia sheet-iron works are to be established at Portsmouth, Ohio, which seems in some measure to confirm the reported success of the operation at Youngstown.—The Wrightsville Iron Company, of Columbia, Pa., capital $80,000, have commenced building their furnace and expect to go to work in October next.—Scientific American.

At a factory in Breslau, pine-tree wool is now spun and woven into a kind of flannel, which is largely used as blankets in hospital, barracks, and prisons, in that city and in Vienna, with manifest advantages, for pine-wood drives away all disagreeable and noxious insects from the localities in which it is used. It can be used as stuffing for chairs, sofas, and mattresses in the same way as horse-hair; and some qualities are woven into a kind of cloth of which garments of many kinds can be made. It is said to be favorable to health as well as to cleanliness. The waste liquor from the pine-wood yields a valuable medicine, and from the waste steam, gas is manufactured to light the factory.

PREVENTION OF SMUT.—The following preparation may be relied on to prevent smut in wheat: Spread the grain rather thinly on the barn floor, and sprinkle it with human urine at the rate of three to four quarts per bushel. Then add from one to two quarts of fresh slacked lime, and shovel the whole over until the kernels are uniformly coated. This should be done immediately before sowing, to prevent injuring the seed. This dressing will also give a quick and strong start to the young plants. A strong solution of blue vitriol, or sulphate of copper, used in the same way, is efficacious in preventing smut, but the first named preparation is often available where the vitriol can not be readily procured.

GALVESTON, May 26.—A dispatch via Brazos, the 21st, to Maj. Gen. Griffin, gives the following:

"Have just received official information from Beriozabal and United States Consul in Matamoros, that Queretaro was captured by Liberals on the 15th inst. Maximilian, Mejia and Castillo, prisoners."

J. J. REYNOLDS, Maj. Gen.

MATAMOROS, May 23.—Siege of Queretaro ended. Republic triumphant. Maximilian and army prisoners. Following dispatch from Escobedo received to-day:

"Citizen Minister of War.—At 3 this morning La Cruz was taken by our forces, who surprised the enemy. Shortly after garrison made prisoners and our troops occupied the plaza. Meanwhile the enemy retreated towards the Cerro de la Campana, where our artillery caused him to surrender at 8 A. M. Maximilian and his generals Castillo and Mejia unconditionally surrendered. You will please give the President my congratulations on this triumph of the National army."

Escobedo reports from interior, stating that Juarez ordered the Archduke and his generals to be shot; were not believed by Government here.

A letter from the American consul at Monterey confirms the capture of the Archduke.

MATAMOROS, May 25.—The Liberal force which took possession of Queretaro has started for the capital.

Commodore J. D. Payan, of the Mexican navy ordered by Beriozabal to command an expedition to Vera Cruz, and so completely terminated the struggle.

Miramón was made prisoner by Cortina a short distance from Queretaro.

The liberals have taken charge of the steamer Gen. Sheridan for naval purposes.

The reply of President Juarez to Minister Campbell recounts the grievances of his party at the conduct of Maximilian. He justifies previous executions, and declines to promise the safety of Maximilian, in the event of his capture.

EUTHANASY.

The Scripture record does not place emphasis upon the phenomena of dissolution. The utterances, the emotions and the demonstrations of the dying are, for the most part, passed over in silence. The first natural deaths, and many subsequent ones are dismissed with the brief phrase, "and he died." Enoch "was not for God took him." "Abraham gave up the ghost and died in a good old age." "Moses the servant of the Lord, died there in the land of Moab, according to the word of the Lord." So David "slept with his fathers, and was buried in the city of David." Paul says of the ancient worthies, "these all died in the faith."

The obituary record of the New Testament is brief. Many must have died in the gospel faith before the date of the latest writings of Paul and John, and doubtless some eminent in the church. Generally it is intimated that they "died in the Lord," and that they "slept in Jesus." John the Baptist was beheaded in prison, James, the brother of John, was killed by the sword, but not a word concerning their last hours. The death of Stephen is an exception. In his case we have the particulars of his testimony, and triumph. He "saw the glory of God, and Jesus standing on the right hand of God." He saw what many dying saints have since seen. Such a testimony was at that time needed to strengthen the faith of the church, and to convince unbelievers. The account of Elijah's closing days upon earth, and his translation is amongst the most thrilling and sublime passages in the Old Testament. This too had its purpose in the confirmation of the primitive faith. The death of Jesus should hardly be mentioned in this connection, as its character and phenomena stand by themselves. He "was made sin for us," and the darkness and conflict of his final hour do not belong to the experience of Christian dying.

Why have we not a more elaborate and particular description of death-scenes in the Bible? It is supposed that there must have been incidents, revelations, and holy triumph in many cases. They were not omitted, because the size of the sacred volume would have been swelled inconveniently. A few pages more than we have, would make little difference. Possibly there was nothing remarkable in the death of these worthies. Nothing startling in what they either saw or felt. Some died tranquilly and peacefully, resting on the premises. The manner of death with some, precluded anything significant in word or look; as would be the case in coma, or delirium, or instantaneous arrest of the living functions. After all, we can but think that there were some amongst them, whose dying hours were distinguished by preternatural manifestations, and by wonderful exhibitions of glowing into sight. But we do not know.

Doubtless this inspired reticence points to some impressive lesson. Precisely and fully what this induction is we do not determine. The great life-facts are minutely detailed. "Enoch walked with God." Noah's fear and faith moved him to obedience in building the Ark. The faith of Abraham is portrayed in the purposed sacrifice of Isaac. Moses' history is full in respect to leading personal, as well as national events. The death of these men, and such as they were, is dismissed in a line, often in a word, without incident, and without a reflection. Elijah and Stephen are the solitary exceptions. Character in the living is portrayed, their faith, obedience, suffering and love. The morning of life, the power of grace upon the soul, the conflicts and victories of the well spent day are recited, but the pencil is withdrawn, just where we might expect the gorgeous sunset to be spread upon the canvas. That they died in the faith we know, and in the assured hope of the "better resurrection." It is an inspired comment that tells us this of the Old Testament saints long after their time; but the history leaves it to inference drawn from their lives and character.

The "blessing" of the New Testament is distinctly pronounced upon the dead; "that die in the Lord," the dead believers are described as sleeping in Jesus. Living witnesses attest their triumph over the fear of death. Would not the pages of the New Testament have been enriched by giving us the last hours and dying testimony of somebody besides that of Stephen? There may be nothing in the Gospel or Epistles that one would wish displaced or left out, to make room, but surely a chapter, or even a book, might have been added for this purpose. What the import of this silence may not be clear, but it is both suggestive and impressive. Individuals and multitudes are converted, and then dismissed from our notice. Lives of piety and usefulness are sketched—great names pass across the field of observation and are lost within the historical limits.

Is there therefore nothing peculiar in Christian dying? Is there no Euthanasia? Whatever there is in it, holy living is the more important. The testimony of a religious life is vainly important. A devoted life is the ever sufficient voucher for the end. It is doubtless an unfounded notion that grace of a peculiar kind and degree is needed in the dying hour. There are passages in every Christian's life where faith and assurance are more severely tested. We remember no Scripture that authorizes the conviction that any peculiar or extraordinary grace is needed in dying. There is no prayer, doctrine or precept that carries the inference. The faith that sustained Abraham through the terrible ordeal of Moriah, was certainly adequate for the last struggle; and as a matter of testimony, no dying words could have added anything to it.

The testimony is as strong, if not stronger, in the living witness, and in life is a perfect illustration and display of all the graces of the Spirit. As compared with health and strength, the dying hour is not most favorable. Many at that time can bear no testimony at all, and with others physical causes may cloud and obscure. That all men are honest, and undecieved when they come to die is evidently not true; and there is much variation in the frame and emotions of dying Christians. There is something unhealthful and morbid in the love which people sometimes have for death-bed scenes. It is certain that the Scriptures do not countenance, nor gratify any extravagant tendency in this direction. Neither the truth of religion, nor the piety of the saint is made to depend upon these phenomenal manifestations.

If the Christian dies in his senses, and the circumstances of his death admit of it, we expect to find peace and comfortable assurance. Christians die well, and sometimes there is what we call triumph—triumph uttered, dazzling light, wavy forms, and celestial melody. The end of the upright is peace, but the death scene often testifies nothing, and we are thrown back upon the holy life, and the promises for assurance that "all is well." Chalmers died alone in the still watches of healthful repose. Fletcher and Toplady, whose poetic laurels had often crossed, died almost seraphically.

In the death of eminent saints, something remarkable is often looked for, and not realized. The chariot and horses of fire come, but not with observation. They are carried home; but they glide noiselessly away. The wind that fills the parting sail is not felt by those who linger on the shore. How we should choose to die in the best left to God. It matters little so we are ready. Happy dying may not be consciously for all; but substantially it is for every Christian. If death is a narrow stream it grows narrower as we approached the brink, until what we supposed to be the turbid flood is left behind. We have looked for death, but have passed it without recognising the fact. "Verily, verily I say unto you, if a man keep my sayings, he shall never see death."

WHISKY.

A brother in the country, who has seen considerable service in the war against Satan, complains that the "Advocate" comes freighted with three different advertisements of liquors. He says farther, "Our trouble here is from the use and traffic in liquors, in the Church and out of it, among whites and blacks. 'Tis the evil.' That a 'bill of charges' was then before him to be tried, at 'next Quarterly Conference,' against an L. D., 'for selling whisky.' The answer was, 'Why, the New Orleans Christian Advocate advertises it!' The statement was denied by our friend; the paper was brought, and sure enough, there it was, 'whisky, whisky, whisky.' He wishes the whole thing speedily erased. 'You know we have always been trying to do something for the paper, but are now in a mighty quandary.'

O for the pen of the veteran editor of the St. Louis Christian Advocate, that we might do justice to this case! Well, by way of beginning, we will say that we wish all the whisky that now is on board the Mayflower, and all the whisky makers—who are determined to make whisky "if the heavens fall"—and the whole concern, were in the middle of the Atlantic, doomed to an endless succession of storms and headwinds, and never more able to reach shore! O that all the grog in the universe could be confined to that one ship's crew! So the brother sees that on that question we are all right, and which way our vote would incline at the proposed Quarterly Meeting. The advertisement was in for six months before we saw it, and, therefore, we can not complain against an old friend for not complaining of it sooner. But it got in, and was paid for, and had rights by occupation, and could not be ejected before the legal expiration of its time.

We believe that it is generally understood that everything that is set forth in this paper is endorsed by the editor; has been seen by him, tested, touched, handled, examined, and pronounced worthy. That he is a conscientious judge of hardware, woolsens, skirts, iron ties, shoes, hicks, bees-wax, whinging machines, false teeth, cosmetics, hair restoratives, spelling books, willowware, carriages, petroleum stoves, carpets, cups, pots, beds, and also of Commission merchants, doctors, dentists, and lawyers. Well, we might as well modestly confess that we do have to know a good deal; and advertisers will please take notice of this fact, that a religious journal advertises in a much more knowing and responsible way than a secular paper, and if it charges more for advertising, it gives more in return. And how these liquor notices got in without proof-specimens, we can not opine, but so it was. When the time runs out, these gentlemen will have to go elsewhere to display the virtue of their wares, we promise that.

The greater part of the whisky that is now sold is worse than whisky. Horrible compounds of alcohol, turpentine, sulphuric acid, strychnine, and chloroform are now vended under the style of "Bourbon," "Old Bourbon," "Manongahela," and other popular titles. The pure stuff itself is bad enough, has in it too enough, sorrows and contentions enough, babbling, "wounds without cause," and redness of eyes full enough. But if it be possible, these hell-broths, concocted by mixers, have not only the bite of the serpent in them, but the sting of the adder. We have less patience every day with those who live by the vice of drunkenness, but more for the drunkard. The inebriate is a diseased wretch worthy of universal commiseration. But we have never been able to understand the course of reasoning which enables a man with a Christian conscience to manufacture and to deal in ardent spirits. While we may not make our own conscience the measure of another man's, we simply state the difficulty. The habitual use of strong drink is by far the most fruitful source of unhappiness, not to say of social ruin and of crime ever yet discovered. It intensifies every evil passion, it gradually blunts the moral sense, it weakens the religious aspirations of a better nature, its tendencies are to constantly lower the sentiments, and to take out of the soul its noblest, highest, and most refined qualities; and this by such gradual and subtle approaches as render its victim equally unconscious of the process and the fact. No man is so strong but that, in a given set of circumstances, he may be overcome by this habit. Sometimes its occasion is the physical infirmity of age, the sudden revulsion of fortune, the mysterious overwhelming loss of loved kindred, the strong influence of congenial and fascinating associates, the constant excitement and overtaxed energies of an active life, the force of custom, the pursuit of office, any thing unusual in situation which elevates or depresses unduly, seems to be seized by the fiend of the wine-cup to accomplish the fatal enslavement of his victim. The best security is, have nothing to do with the habitual use of intoxicating drink.

What shall we do? Shall we sign the Temperance pledge? Do this: look at your wife and your children; look at your boys; see how they watch you, and imitate all that you do; add, recollect, the sober moderate drinking of the father often ends in the drunkenness of the son. Look at your neighbor, help him to be sober and to keep so. Do not argue too much for wine, nor for the "moderate use" of these "good things." The argument will be supplied by others in sufficient force to apologize for all the really open temperate drinking that is done, and for a good deal of the quiet, intemperate, nighttime drinking, besides. The supporters of that side of the question have nothing to fear. There is, we fear, no immediate danger of excess in the direction of sobriety. Comparatively few young men have become drunkards from an undue parental restraint in the opposite direction. The Army of Drunkards is mainly recruited from among those who claim for themselves and others the entire safety and innocence of the habitual use of ardent spirits. Many a frail bark has been launched upon this stream, and has passed out of sight for a long period amid its unknown windings, to reappear at last struggling with waves, as hopeless and dark as those of deadly Acheron.

The Romish Church at Home.

From a letter of Carlton in the Boston Journal, written from Italy, we take the following passage, which will be read with much interest. We have seen no other statement on this general subject so full and detailed as this:

In 1855 a decree was issued, under which 2,099 monasteries and nunneries were broken up. These institutions had an annual income from invested property amounting to $730,000, and which gave a living to 4,726 priests, monks and nuns. One hundred and eighty-two of these establishments had no revenue, but gave shelter to 3,145 monks who went from door to door begging their bread. This, let it be remembered, was in the kingdom of Sardinia alone. The law under which this property was taken by the State provided that it should be devoted to the education of the people, and another law was passed establishing a system of public instruction, and also a portfolio in the ministry having the education of the people in charge.

The execution of this decree brought the wrath of the Pope upon Victor Emmanuel. But it was the beginning of a new era for Italy. The school systems of the United States and of Prussia were consulted, professional gentlemen were sent to America who brought back school books which have been translated into Italian, and are now in use in the public schools of the kingdom.

Four years passed, bringing the struggle of 1859—the shot decisive campaign, beginning at Magenta and ending at Solferino, by which the Austrians were pushed out of Lombardy; followed by the revolution in Tuscany, Naples—or the Two Sicilies, as that Kingdom was called—and the States of the Church, all of which, with the exception of the present territory of the Pope, were annexed to Sardinia. To speak more correctly, we should say that the Constitution and King of Sardinia were accepted by the people of these kingdoms and duchies, and that Italy became a nation.

Naples at that time was ground to poverty and degradation between two millstones, that of the Bourbon King and that of the Church. Which ground hardest, it is difficult to say. The King was a despot and tyrant; he was, however, but one man, while those ecclesiastics who lived upon the people were numbered by thousands. There were 1,020 establishments for men, containing 13,611 monks, of whom 3,899 were mendicants. The remaining 4712 had an annual revenue of $930,000. In addition, there were 272 nunneries, containing 8001 nuns, having an annual income from invested property of $950,000, making a total annual income of one million eight hundred and eighty thousand dollars, consumed by 12,713 men and women, who were non-producers in the community, and who, however forwent their prayers may have been, gave only the prayers and the counting of beads in return, with perhaps on the part of the nuns occasional nursing of the sick.

The valuation of this property estimated at about fifty million dollars. Fifty millions will build fourteen hundred miles of railroad, the rate of thirty-five thousand dollars per mile—the average count roads in the United States would open the line from St. Paul to the Columbia river, and from Boston within twenty-eight days to Shanghai. This in various ways had all been obtained from the people, and was used solely for the benefit of the classes named, who controlled it independent of the State.

But besides these twelve hundred and well fed persons were the monks—nearly nine thousand monks—who spent their time in begging from door to door, their food I saw a number of the mendicants in Venice; men in grey cloaks, with a piece of rag round the waist, bare-headed, feet, with bags on their shoulders filled with potatoes, pieces of bread, turnips, cabbages, or whatever shop-keepers, hucksters, and vendors had seen fit to give. A filthier I never have seen.

We are not to confound the convents and nunneries with the churches, which are possessed of no fabulous wealth. The report of the valuation of the property of the kingdom gives the total annual income of the colleges, chapels, churches at thirteen millions two hundred thousand dollars! Let this be capitalized at four per cent, we have an investment of over ten hundred million dollars, owned and controlled by the Roman Church in Italy, not including the enormous wealth accumulated at Rome. This is about equal to four-fifths of the present national debt of the United States, the whole of which has been taken from the people by various methods.

It is hardly possible to conceive of the ignorance and debasement of the people when the Constitution of Sardinia was extended over Naples and the States taken from the Church. Those provinces which had been under the Pope were cast down in the scale. In the territory, according to the census of 1864, of every 1,000 persons could neither read nor write. Throughout the whole of the peninsula and Naples, more than ten-tenths of the people were unable to read or write. Philadelphia stands highest of all the provinces in the scale of intelligence, even there, 573 out of every 1,000 are unable to read or write.

According to the census of 1864, out of a total population of 21,710, there were only 3,884,245 could read and write. Here is a country where the Roman religion was the only religion. Education was, wholly in the hands of priests, monks and nuns, who, under the jurisdiction of the Pope and who were independent of the State. In Naples alone there are 3,094 large parishes which have schools, and the few schools which were in existence were taught by men who were devoid of the elementary knowledge. Let it be understood as saying that the Romish priests are ignorant and degraded men; on the contrary many of them are learned and accomplished, but such men are found teaching common school, they occupy high positions in the Church, or in ecclesiastical colleges.

To comprehend the condition of Italy, as it was two years ago, must compare it with the United States—or as the United States would be if it were like Italy. Imagine all New England, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Michigan to have less than one-third the schools, and all the people of the States—every man, woman, and child to be unable to read or write—seventeen millions in utter ignorance, and you will have the condition of Italy! Churches by the thousands, and priests without number, few schools, newspapers, and printing presses. We are to take these things into consideration, we would rightly understand the condition of the Italy of the present.

We are to keep in mind also that this is the civilization of the Church.

MARRIED.

THE CHILD'S CORNER.

MAY.

When the hounds of spring are on winter's traces,
The mother of months in meadow or plain Fills the shadows and windy places
With lip of leaves and ripple of rain;
And the brown bright nightingale amorous
In half assuaged for Tytus,
For the Thracian ships and the foreign faces,
The tongueless vigil, add all the pain.

Come with bows bent and with emptying of quivers,
Maiden most perfect, lady of light,
With a noise of winds and many rivers,
With a clamor of waters, and with might;
Bled on thy sandals, O thou most fleet,
Over the splendor and speed of thy feet;
For the faint east quickens, the wan west aliv-
ers,
Round the feet of the day and the feet of the night.

Where shall we find her, how shall we sing to her,
Fold our hands round her knees, and cling?
O that man's heart were as fire and could spring
to her,

Fire, or the strength of the streams that spring;
For the stars and the winds are unto her
As raiment, as songs of the harp-player,
For the risen stars and the fallen cling to her,
And the southwest wind and the west wind sing.

For winter's rains and ruins are over,
And all the season of snows and ains;
The days dividing lover and lover,
The light that loses, the night that wins;
And time remembered is grief forgotten,
And frosts are slain and flowers begotten,
And in green underwood and cover
Blossom by blossom the spring begins.

The full streams feed on flower of rushes;
Ripe grasses trammel a travelling foot,
The faint fresh flame of the young year flushes
From leaf to flower and flower to fruit;
And fruit and leaf are as gold and fire,
And the oat is a hear above the tyre,
And the hoofed heel of a satyr crushes
The chestnut husk at the chestnut roost.

The Wonderful Bird of Eden.

A PERSIAN STORY.

By the side of a beautiful stream in Persia, was the palace of Selim Bey, a prince of vast wealth, and whose wisdom excelled his wealth. Beautiful, indeed, was the palace, built of the most glorious material, gleaming in the oriental sunlight, or bathed in the golden flood of soft moonbeams. All about it stood hills, clothed with delightful trees, and the palace itself was buried in a grove of olives, and surrounded by a garden filled with the rarest flowers and plants of the greatest beauty. A hundred fountains, of wondrous pattern, kept up a continuous musical plashing, and a thousand birds, of brilliant plumage, flew among the blossom-laden boughs, and filled the air with enchanting melody; so that the young prince, sitting by his casement in the evening, was lulled with the music of the waters and the harmony of the birds, and soothed with the rich perfumes that filled the air. But Selim Bey was not satisfied with olive groves and fountains, nor with all the rare and dazzling beauty of his palace. For in the most pleasantly situated chamber in the palace was his library, where there were rolls containing all the most valuable writings of the wise men of all ages. Here Selim spent most of his time in communion with the great minds whose thoughts were written in those books. But sometimes, weary of the great thoughts of philosopher and sage, he would take down a beautiful poem, and walk with it to his garden bower, on the bank of the river. Then, seating himself on a divan, he would alternately enjoy the gambols of the beautiful fish in the cool waters below, and the delightful thoughts of the poet. For Selim was very famous for his wisdom and learning.

On entering his bower thus, one day, what was his surprise to see perched there, a bird of the most wondrous appearance, not like anything he had ever seen before, nor indeed had he ever dreamed of anything so glorious. In his astonishment, he let the roll, containing a poem of his favorite poet, Saadi, drop from his hands, and stood, in mute wonder, gazing at the strange being before him.

It could hardly be called a bird, though it was a bird in form. The breast was a sort of amber, half luminous, shining with a soft, golden light. The plumage on the rest of the body was of a brilliant, pearly whiteness, so brilliant that the eye soon became dazzled in looking at it. And its tail, flowing full two yards in length, and of the most exquisite proportions, was absolutely glorious, full of rainbows, gleaming with different hues, as if it had been studded with precious stones, the down hanging from it in long, silken tassels, each pendant shining as if it were a string of minute diamonds. Its face was more angelic than bird-like.

"Art thou a bird, or an angel from heaven?" exclaimed the prince, when he recovered himself.

"I am the Bird of Wisdom, that dwelt in the Garden of Eden with Adam and Eve, and lived in the boughs of the tree of knowledge of Good and Evil."

"How fortunate I am!" cried the prince. "Now shall I learn wisdom. For if thou art the Wonderful Bird of Wisdom, and didst abide in the beautiful branches of the tree of knowledge, then is thy wisdom doubtless yet more glorious than thy plumage."

"I will teach thee on certain condition," said the bird. "Thou shalt come hither every day. I will talk with thee. When evening draws on, I must leave thee, for since the day that Adam left the garden, I have not been allowed to spend a night on the earth. I will spend the night in the great palaces of the clouds, and sitting in the moonbeams on the great cloud mountains. But if I teach thee, thou must do one thing. Take my tablet and write upon it at night the chiefest of the maxims that I utter. Whenever I shall speak to thee a golden truth, and thy selfishness shall make thee neglect to write it down, I shall leave thee; for the Bird of Wisdom can only stay where its precepts are taken into the heart."

And so for hours the prince listened to the conversation of the Bird, until the going down of the sun.

When, on the second morning, Selim Bey came into the garden house, the Bird was waiting.

"What have you written down?" asked the Bird.

Selim proceeded to read the beautiful proverb that the Bird had uttered in its conversation of the day before. Last on the list he read this:

"A respectful word from a wise man is better than the profoundest homage of a fool."

"Yes," said the Bird, "and perhaps you would like to hear a story of the great and wise Pasha, Abdallah Bey."

There was such melody in the Bird's voice, that it seemed as if the music of all the sweetest birds of the universe were in its throat. Selim listened entranced, until the sound died away, and answered with delight,

"Certainly, Wonderful Bird, I should like to hear the story."

THE STORY OF ABDALLAH BEY.

"The wise Pasha was traveling through his dominions unattended, desiring to know his subjects, that he might govern them better, when he stopped at the house of a good man, Abul Cazim. Abul did not know who his guest was, but treated him with the utmost hospitality. He was poor, but cheerfully prepared to give up his own couch to the stranger."

"Now Abul had a brother of a selfish and sycophantic disposition. From something in the appearance of Abdallah, he inferred that he was at least a man of considerable rank. So he broke out with—

"Brother! brother! give the stranger the best couch."

"But I cannot," said Abul, "for that is already occupied by Yahye, the good dervish."

"But he is only a dervish," responded the brother.

"Nevertheless, he is a good man, and a wise man," said Abul; "and, furthermore, weary with a day's journey on foot; and if the stranger were the Pasha, Abdallah himself, I could not give him the bed occupied by the poor dervish."

"And so, the Pasha lay on the couch of Abul Cazim, and Abul lay upon the floor."

"When the morning came, and Abdallah rose, the dervish recognized him, and made a profound obeisance, saluting him as Pasha. The latter expressed his delight at meeting his old friend the dervish, while Abul and his brother also made obeisance to the guest, whom they were surprised to find was the great Pasha himself."

"I have need," said the Pasha, "of a just and prudent man to fill the place of my old Vizier, who has recently died, and I have thoughts of taking our good friend, Abul Cazim, with whom I am greatly pleased."

"Nay, rather take me," cried the brother of Abul, who trusted he would find favor on account of his eagerness, the night before, to give the best couch to Abdallah Bey, at the expense of the poor dervish."

"Nay, I shall not take you," said the Pasha, sarcastically; "I have flatterers enough. You were very respectful, last night, not to me, for you did not know me; but you were respectful to the diamond, whose gleam you happened to see in the hilt of my sword. But if I have Abul Cazim for my Vizier, I shall know that the respect he shows me is intended for me, and not for my wealth."

"It is the choice of wisdom," said the dervish, "for the respect of a wise man is better than a flattery of fools."

And thus, with proverbs and stories, the Bird discoursed to Selim Bey for many days, always taking his flight to the clouds at sunset, but leaving a beautiful light in the garden bower throughout the night. Every night the prince set down on a tablet the most important things spoken by the Bird during the day.

At last, in one of his conversations, the Wonderful Bird of Eden said:

"To enjoy wealth and get wisdom, are unworthy pursuits, unless the wealth and wisdom are blessings to other besides the possessor of them."

Now it must be confessed that these words stung the prince, who felt reproved by them, and he tried to dismiss them from his mind. In the evening, when he came to set down his golden truths, he kept these words out of his mind, though a vague feeling of uneasiness took possession of him. That night he had a troubled sleep, and arose at midnight to look out of his casement. What was his alarm at seeing the garden bower entirely dark. Hastily crossing to it, he found it without light, and all the vines around it blasted and withered.

The Wonderful Bird of Wisdom never came back. But in profound grief, Selim sat down and recalled all that the Bird had said, until he saw plainly what it was that he had forgotten.

"If," said he, "it is on account of my selfishness that I have forgotten these words, then they are, of all the words spoken by the Bird, the most important to me."

And so Selim planted new vines about the garden bower, and gave it the name of the "Bower of the Bird." And in that bower he hung a plate of gold, with the forgotten words upon it.

And in the days that followed, the groves and gardens of the Prince Selim were filled with the poor and the sick, and students and poets were in his library, and the wisdom of Selim Bey ministered to the happiness of others.

And thus the Persian prince learned the lesson of true wisdom only by the loss of his counsellor.

FARM AND GARDEN.

CULTURE OF POTATOES.—The potato, to attain its best condition, must have a soil peculiarly adapted to it; none others will produce it in its highest quality. Clayey soils will not produce the best flavor and quality; but a high, dry, warm soil, with a good proportion of sand, in a good state fertility, is best to give quality and flavor. Richer grounds will produce greater yields, but at the expense of quality, with a greater liability to disease. A medium sized tuber and quantity to a given area will give better quality, with less liability to accidents, than a large, heavy crop.

The manure should be applied, and well incorporated with the soil, in previous seasons to growing potatoes. If any applications are made they should be given as a top dressing to the young plants. Fresh manures applied to the soil the season of growth are not beneficial to the potato, but on the contrary a detriment.

The ground should be plowed, prepared, and the potatoes planted as soon as the soil will admit of being well worked up in Spring. Good deep plowing, and thorough fiving the soil, are essential.

Every section and market has its favorite varieties, so that what would be considered best in New York, would find little or no favor in Philadelphia or Boston. The varieties are so numerous, well disseminated, or ventilated, that it would be impracticable to discuss or select any particular localities. The several Goodrich Seedlings, Early Sebce, Mewer, Prince Albert, Colebrook and Davis Seedlings, Peach-blow, etc., for early and late crops are adapted to all markets. A white skinned and fleshed potato, that would boil mealy throughout, is the best quality.

Hills are to be preferred to drills for planting; although the latter may give the greater yield, the labor is greatly augmented, and the sun and air are more excluded from the soil, causing the yield to be of poor quality. The ground being well plowed and harrowed, lay of the rows 3 feet apart, with a light plow, turning a furrow four to six inches deep; into these drop the potatoes, one in a place, two to two and a half feet apart, depending upon the growth of the tops—very small growing varieties may be put nearer; cover with a hand hoe, hauling one hoe full on each potato, without treading or spitting down. A man will cover nearly as fast as he can walk over the ground.

Just before the potatoes break through the ground, take a square harrow, turn it bottom up, and drag over the field, destroying any small weeds, leveling the drills and the whole surface. The after cultivation consists in going through twice with the small plow, turning the soil slightly toward the plants, and following with the hand hoe, making a broad, liberal sized hill, giving the sun a better chance to warm up the soil than if left level; when they commence to blossom lay them by, but go through once or twice and pull out any weeds that may have come up and are likely to detract from the well doing of the crop.

No method has been invented equal to hand digging and picking. The tops cleared off, an expert man will haul them out pretty fast with a good potato hook, and then if anyways nimble, he will pick them into baskets rapidly, digging and picking thirty or forty bushels in a day, perhaps more.

TRANSPLANTING.—The success of transplanting depends mainly on two pre-requisites—young trees well taken up and in good condition, and a good, well-prepared soil to set them in. If dug last Autumn, and properly protected by heeling in, they will be in excellent condition for setting out for some time to come. If not dug till Spring, they should be taken up immediately, or before the buds swell and the young roots start, and heeled or buried in until wanted for transplanting. This is much better than taking them up later, as they meet with less check in growth. We have known trees thus treated to succeed well, even when set out several weeks afterward, when trees generally were in full leaf. It is, however, quite essential that they be well taken care of, by not allowing the roots to become dry for an hour, and by filling in all the interstices among them with fine earth, when heeling in as well as setting out. It is very common for such trees to be soiled or ruined by leaving the roots exposed a day or two to the sun or drying air, and the burying them badly by throwing on lumps of earth or large masses by the shovel, leaving vacancies all through the lower parts of the roots.

A good soil for trees is important, especially one that has a good natural or artificial underdrainage; but it is still more important, if possible, that it be in a good melow condition when they are set out, and that it be kept so throughout the season. Observe the following directions in setting out each tree, namely, to spread out the roots in all directions, like the arms of an extended umbrella. This will stiffen the tree against the wind and give the trunk an upright, stont growth, and to fill in fine earth so that there will be no crevices or interstices. It is well to settle the soil among the roots, by pouring in water till the hole is filled. If the tree is large and the roots small, it will be necessary to stake the tree against the wind, but not otherwise.

As all newly set trees require some shortening back, both for the purpose of forming an even, well-shaped head and for lessening the number of leaf buds, so as to correspond with the necessary topping of some of the roots, careful attention should be given that this cutting back be done before the buds swell or expand. If done afterward, it checks growth, and has induced some persons wrongly to suppose that cutting back is always useless or hurtful.

It sometimes happens, in setting out young orchards, that it is inconvenient to prepare the whole surface of the young trees that are to occupy it at distances of thirty or forty feet. It answers about as well to plow strips some six feet wide, where the row are to stand, and plant the trees in the middle of these strips, which are to be kept clean and mellow through the season, either by planting with potatoes, beans rutabagas cabbages, or by leaving it unoccupied with any crop. The wider spaces, between the rows may be planted with corn, sown grain or occupied as meadow, provided that, in the later instance, rather more breadth is given to the cultivated strips in which the trees stand.

HOUSEKEEPER'S DEPARTMENT.

BEAN SOUP.—When properly made, there is no soup nicer, richer, or more wholesome. Remember, that good white beans, properly cooked, contain about ninety per cent. of nourishment. So, if we make them in the right way, into a common-sense soup, the nourishment is all there; and a bowl of it, hot and nicely seasoned, will carry one longer, and more comfortable, through a cold Winter day, either in doors or out, than a breakfast of dinner of fried, baked, boiled or stewed meats, with all sorts of auxiliaries that cost ten times as much. Use always the small, white field beans for soup; and, having picked them over carefully, so that there shall be only fair, good, sound beans, put them to soak in plenty of water at night, and in the morning, directly after breakfast, they are first parboiled ten minutes. Then the water is changed, and a piece of nice, fat, corned pork, previously parboiled also, is put in with the beans, and with it a teaspoonful of salt. After boiling an hour and a half, remove the pork, and prepare it for baking by scoring the rind evenly about a quarter of an inch apart, and an equal depth. Place it in a deep dripping pan, and fill in around it with beans, skinned from the pot, making them pretty thin with incipient soup. Finish up the baked pork and beans by placing them in a moderately hot oven, and baking slowly, four or five hours.

Going back to the soup, there are to be left in the pot enough beans and bean both to make a supply of soup for as many as are to be served. First, set the pot back where the heat is moderate, else the material will be liable to burn at the bottom, and so spoiled. Pare, wash, and slice up thin half a dozen good sound potatoes, and put them in the pot. Then make into crumbs any dry (clean) crusts of bread, or bits of crackers, and put them into thickening the soup, season suitably with black pepper and salt, if needed; and if not too fastidious, to eat onions, slice up a couple of fair sized ones and put them into the soup ten minutes before it is to be taken up. Onions are wholesome, and add much to the flavor and richness of bean soup.

How to BOIL MEAT.—Very many of the cook books that it has been our pleasure to read while arranging this portion of the Traveller, recommend the putting of meat to boil in cold water. This has been contrary to our idea of the fitness of things, and we never advised our readers to do so. Brewer's Guide to Things Familiar says the reason why meat is tough when put into the boiler before the water boils is because the water is not hot enough to coagulate the albumen between the muscular fibers of the meat, which therefore runs into the water and rises to the surface as a scum. The best way to boil meat to make it tender is this: Put your joint in very brisk boiling water; after a few minutes add a little cold water. The boiling water will fix the albumen, which will prevent the water soaking into the meat; keep all the juices in, and prevent all the muscular fiber from contracting. The addition of cold water will secure the cooking of the inside of the joint, as well as of the surface.

Why is meat tough that has been boiled too long?

Because the albumen becomes hard, like the white of a hard-boiled egg.

TO MAKE CORN BREAD.—Take half a pint, good measure, of white Indian meal, which should be rather coarsely ground. Mix it thoroughly, in a large bowl, with one pint of fresh milk. Put in what salt is necessary, and into the batter break one fresh egg, and with a kitchen fork beat the whole together quickly and thoroughly. Have your oven pretty hot, but not scorching. Into a splayed-sided round tin pan, of say 4 inches diameter at the bottom and 1 to 3 inches deep, pour your batter (which will about half fill the pan), and put it into the oven instantly. If ought to bake, in the oven is properly regulated, in about half an hour. It must be perfectly done to be good. Don't be discouraged with the first attempt; it requires some practice to hit it precisely, but this is done, it is done, it is excellent. It is to be eaten hot, before the upper crust falls, with butter.

NICE WHITE CAKE.—Two cups sugar, two and a half cups of flour, half a cup of butter, three quarters of a cup of milk, the whites of eight eggs, one spoonful cream tartar, and half a teaspoonful of soda.

POTATOES AND FISH.—Carefully mash half a dozen very mealy potatoes, boiled or steamed without the addition of salt; add some butter or cream, and season them to your taste. Beat in a mortar about two tablespoonfuls of cold boiled salt fish, add a little milk or cream, a small quantity of grated nutmeg and lemon peel, and a whole raw egg; when quite smooth, mix it with the potatoes, place all together in a mold, buttered and sprinkled with rasped toast, squeeze over it some lemon juice, and bake it until it begins to brown—turn it out to serve.

EXCELLENT RECIPE FOR PASTRY.—Pour on the bread board one pint best flour, and divide it into two parts. Mix (with cold water) one-half the flour into a soft dough, and work or beat with your rolling pin until it blisters, occasionally drawing up some of the dry flour to prevent the dough adhering to the board. Then roll as thin as possible, and at intervals of about two inches place lumps of butter the size of a lickory nut. Fold the dough up thus: Turn the outer edge toward you, and then the one nearest you to meet the first; fold one of the ends toward your left, and then other over it, and roll it, and roll out thin again. Repeat this operation four times, and if the directions are closely observed, you will have what I have heard called "magic pastry." You should bake in a quick oven, and if the pastry is placed in the pie plates and allowed to sit in a cool place an hour, before putting in the fruit or mixture, it will be improved. Lard may be used if you cannot obtain butter—at half pound of the latter is sufficient, but less lard.

Now, I wish some of the pondents of the Country Club to give this receipt a trial, and what objection they may have, and what improvement they make.

I am neither a cook nor a keeper, and when you hear me will get out of conceit of my perhaps, but I have watched the process of pastry making some time, and have never seen it in our house; and I say the literally melts in the mouth as the times it was rolled. receipt were more unknown and followed. I feel we should not so often complain: "I wonder why make good pastry; I have tried, but it is of no use."

Somebody please let me the results of their trial after this.—N. Y. News.

NEW ORLEANS MARKETS.

From the N. O. Price Current.

The general market has exhibited but few changes during the past three days. Its prevailing characteristics have been a moderate demand and steady prices. In our leading staple, however, there has been less regularity, with few quotable changes. Operations in Sugar and Molasses continue to be confined to retail transactions. Tobacco is held at previous rates, but buyers stand aloof, and no sales have transpired, of any moment. In Western Produce we notice an easier market for flour, and a favorable reaction for corn.

COTTON.—The business has consequently been of limited extent, but there would be a fair demand at a lower range of prices. On Saturday, with nothing in the foreign accounts to stimulate the demand, and little disposition on the part of the factors to sell unless at outside rates, the sales comprised 2200 bales, at figures showing no quotable variation, although the general tendency was in favor of sellers. On Monday the movement being restricted by the difficulty of passing commercial bills was on a more limited scale, comprising only 1750 bales, but prices indicated increased buoyancy, in some descriptions, but less firmness in others. Tuesday there was about the usual enquiry, but operations were again checked by stringent pretension of factors, compared with the views of buyers, as well as by continued difficulty in negotiating Commercial Sterling, and the business was confined to 1700 bales, mostly for the completion of pending orders, while the previous irregularity in prices was still more marked, requiring a reduction from Friday's currency of 1c, in Ordinary, and of 1/2c in Middling, and a partial advance of 1/2c in Good Ordinary.

This makes an aggregate for the past three days of 5,650 bales, taken partly for the North, but mostly for foreign export.

The receipts proper since Friday evening comprise 5650 bales, against 2902 during the corresponding period last week, showing an increase of 362 bales.

The receipts at this port, since the 1st of September, (exclusive of the arrivals from Mobile, Florida and Texas), are 678, 601 bales, against 643,210 bales to same date last year, and the decrease in the receipts at all the ports, up to the latest date, as compared with last year, is 152,887 bales. In the exports from the United States to foreign countries, as compared with the same dates last year, there is a decrease of 66,010 bales to Great Britain, of 38,294 to France, and an increase of 34,231 bales to other foreign ports.

We quote as follows:

Low...... 20 to 21
Ordinary...... 22 to 23
Good Ordinary...... 23 to 24
Low Middling...... 24 to 25
Fair...... 25 to 26
Middling...... 26 to 27
Choice...... 27 to 28

TOBACCO.—There has been some enquiry, and several offers were made, but only a few small sales have been effected. The market is very firm and we continue to quote:

Light...... 4 to 4 1/2
Heavy...... 4 1/2 to 5
Good do...... 5 to 5 1/2
Common Leaf...... 6 to 6 1/2
Medium...... 7 to 7 1/2
Fair...... 8 to 8 1/2
Choice...... 9 to 9 1/2

FLOUR.—The market is dull and depressed, although the stock on hand is not large. Sales for the past three days sum up 2,700 barrels, within our quotations.

Monetary.

Referring to the comments in our preliminary remarks, we can only say that the general movement has been on a very limited scale, and that while negotiations in the open market have been restricted to a few negotiations of mortgage paper and loans secured by satisfactory collaterals, only a moderate amount has been done by the banks in exchange and discounts. They have, however, been materially strengthened by withdrawing a large portion of their balances at New York in greenbacks, and with the renewal of former confidence, on the part of depositors, will no doubt soon be able to offer greater facilities to their customers.

EXCHANGE.—The movement in foreign exchange has been restricted by the scant supply of first class bills offering, and the reluctance of banks to accept any others unless at disproportionately lower rates, to which drawers would not agree.

PIANO FORTES, MELODEONS,

GUITARS, VIOLINS,

And other musical Instruments. Also, Music
and Instruction Books, Music Folios, Note Paper,
—in fact everything belonging to music trade.

The repairing and tuning of Pianos will be attended to, arrangements having been made with that well known Piano Maker, M. BUICH-ARDT, who will take charge of that department
—charges will be reasonable and satisfactory.

Parties wishing can have their Pianos stored,
sold on commission, boxed, or shipped to order.
Fiducially for repairing Pianos, such as Wire,
Felt, Cloth, etc., constantly for sale.

Piano Stools, Covers of elegant patterns, etc., on hand.

Any information on musical matters cheerfully given. Teachers recommended.

P.S.—P. P. WERLEIN will be found at times
at the above place, and will aid in making relations. He recommends his son PHILIP WERLEIN to his former friends and customers, and solicits
their patronage for him.

THE PRESIDENTIAL EMBLEM.

The propriety of dispensing with this office by appointing a Bishop for each Conference is now being discussed by the preachers. All who have any knowledge of Methodist economy know that the Eldership in some form must be retained in the Church. What could one Bishop accomplish during twelve months in an Annual Conference, where there are one hundred and fifty or two hundred circuits and stations, embracing from four to six hundred churches? If one or the other of these offices must be dispensed with, and the itinerant system be retained, I would greatly prefer giving up the Episcopacy, or so increase the number of Bishops as to meet the real wants of the Church. In that event they would be so numerous as to lose the novelty which now to a great extent sustains that office. Would it not be better to keep as many Bishops in the field as could conveniently attend all Annual Conferences, and then strengthen the itinerancy and unity of the Church, so managing the Presiding Eldership as to restore its former usefulness?

Why are these changes desired? They are only desired in certain quarters. All admit that the Eldership is decidedly important for the more thinly populated districts where the preachers and people are less cultivated. Would not an increase of Bishops occasion similar feelings? Another difficulty is—restlessness under restraint. With others the principal objection is financial, but the most substantial reasons are found in the abuse of the office itself. We fear that some accept the office as a mere matter of convenience, not comprehending its true dignity, or realizing its weighty responsibilities. It may be that some parties have remained a long time at certain points, yet they cannot be moved, and will not locate. What can the stationing authorities do, but make them Presiding Elders? Thus, they become chief ministers, where, in fact, they are unacceptable to all stations and circuits within their bounds. It may be, fresh from their farms or merchandise—but not from the mercy-seat. They attend quarterly meetings, preach Saturday and Sunday mornings, then leave immediately for home. All feel that the Elder came only to shear, and not to feed the sheep. A great difficulty is found in placing age and infirmities of body on districts. Why must infirm age endure the hardship and toil of the Elderships, while men of body and mind are placed in stations by no means calculated to develop the most superior faculties and energies of their nature.

Why not apply such manhood that the whole Church will feel its power? Again: the best talents should be put in the Presiding Eldership, that all may recognize its importance. The ministry ought to remember, that however much opposition some may feel towards this office, that in the economy of our Church the Elder, equally with the pastor in charge, is connected with the interests of the Church, and rightly entitled to support, etc. The pastor may injure the influence of the Church by appointing the Quarterly Conference on minor points of the circuit, or by failing to give publicity to them on stations. I went with a Presiding Elder to an important station, not long since, and when we reached the church about the hour of service, found it unopened, and no bell rung; no preaching at night, and it seemed from the little interest manifested, that the minister discouraged the Quarterly Meeting in every possible way.

I feel fully convinced that the Bishops, by exercising firmness in Episcopal authority, can at once remedy this evil, simply by putting the most efficient men in this office. It has long given dignity to those who hold it, but now its back-bone is well nigh broken. Something must be done. Let the Presiding Elder be a man fully competent to command respect, and be the pastor of preachers and people, not to be invited up and down by every boy who may chance to be in his field; not to pass through as a mere visitor; but let him be a man in authority, directing the spiritual and temporal interest of the Church. The Eldership gives larger facilities for usefulness and success than any other position in the whole Church. Quarterly Meeting occasions have generally been regarded as feasts of the Church, when all the members are expected to be present. At this time, when the proper man is on the district, the piety, energy and faith of the people is active and operative. The Elder should give tone to the zeal of the preachers, and strengthen the ministry under his care. His duty is to watch for favorable opportunities to concentrate his forces, and hold protracted meetings. There is not a Presiding Elder in the State of Alabama, who might not, by properly using his position, set the whole district on fire.

Let him—together with several other ministers—at the proper time, at Station A, work himself with them, and not slip off home as a deserter as soon as the meeting begins, leaving the ministers without his generalship, to fight the battle alone. If the Elder will make the sacrifice, and stand by the preachers to the end of the contest, much may be accomplished. Let him take the cross, and with his own hands plant it on the ramparts of the enemy.

Then, the whole Church under his charge will feel that in their Elder they have manhood, piety and zeal. If he will go from point to point on his district, holding protracted meetings, the preacher will very soon catch his spirit, and Zion will rejoice. No true Methodist minister has ever complained of such a Presiding Elder. Under God such a man is a tower of strength on his district; not a bowing wall.

S. P. R.
REV. DAVID KINNEAR—BIOGRAPHICAL.

Rev. David Kinnear was born in Venango county, Pennsylvania, on the 1st of June, 1802.

He was given to God and the Church in infancy by his parents, Andrew and Dinah Kinnear, in baptism, and trained by a holy mother, "in the way he should go," and at the early age of six years, while his mother was endeavoring to explain to him the nature of God, light broke into his mind, and from that time he dates his conversion to God. In the summer of 1812, his parents removed to Pickaway county, Ohio. In 1818, he voluntarily united with the Methodist Episcopal Church, to which his parents had given him, and the following year, August 25th, received a clearer and fuller satisfaction that he was born of God. His parents removed thence to Marion county, Ohio, and David engaged in teaching for several years. In 1827, he was licensed to exhort, and after using his gifts and graces in this office for a time, was, on the 25th of July, 1830, licensed to preach, and the following year admitted on trial into the traveling ministry, Ohio Conference, and appointed in charge of the Nicholas circuit. In 1832, was appointed to Salt Creek circuit. At the close of this year, on account of feeble health, he gave up his connection with the Conference, and spent the two following years in the South, where he labored as a minister of Christ, entering every open door of usefulness, as far as his health would justify. In 1834, at the Ohio Conference, he was ordained to the office of a Deacon, and was abundant in labors and usefulness as a local preacher during the years 1835 and 1836. For several years previous to this, brother Kinnear had been seeking entire satisfaction, and on the 12th of May, 1836, after preaching from Romans v. 1-5, and leading the class, in which he was greatly blessed, he retired to secret prayer, and there, while in communion with God, he experienced that great blessing. The evidence was so full and clear to his consciousness, that he had no doubt upon the subject. In October following, was readmitted on trial into the Ohio Conference, and at his own request was transferred by Bishop Soule to the Missouri Conference, and appointed to Richmond circuit. The next spring he was appointed Missionary and school teacher by the Church and United States Government to the Kickapoo Indian mission, then in the hands of Rev. J. C. Berryman. Here brother Kinnear labored with great energy, zeal and perseverance, for the intellectual and religious culture of these red men of the forest, giving his whole strength and time to the work, and in addition to this, with a quenchless desire for the extension of the Savior's kingdom, and an unselfish love of souls, he gave all his wages received from the Government, amounting to $1500, to the Missionary cause. In 1838, he was ordained Elder by Bishop Soule. In 1839, the Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church established among the Indians a manual labor school, and brother Kinnear having been largely influential in its establishment, was appointed superintendent of the school. Here, in this mission field, he first met Miss Elizabeth Lee, who had been sent out as a missionary teacher from New York, and was the first teacher in the male department of this school, and on account of her ability, piety and efficiency, was retained in the school for three years. On the 10th of March 1840, brother Kinnear and Miss Lee were united in marriage. These devoted and laborious missionaries taught twelve hours per day in this school, besides having the care of the pupils day and night, and the Sabbath school, and attending with them upon all the religious services, and this for years. Under such excessive toil his health failed, and he requested to be released, and was appointed in 1841 to Independence circuit. His health still declined, and in 1842 he located and came South, and was employed to fill Opelousas station in 1843. Was re-admitted at the Conference at Woodville, Miss., this year, and appointed for 1844 and '45 to Chicot circuit. In 1846 he was appointed to Madison parish colored mission.

At the close of this year Louisiana Conference came into existence, and brother Kinnear was appointed to Opelousas colored mission in Louisiana Conference. In 1848 and '49 appointed to Moreau Street Church, New Orleans, and in 1850 served Wesley and Soule Chapels—colored charge. In 1851, '52 and '53, traveled Opelousas district. From 1853 until '59 he served the Church in different fields, as far as his health would permit, and in 1860 settled in Jackson, Louisiana, where he went in and out before the Church as a man of God, doing all in his power for the cause of Christ, and illustrating in his walk and afflictions the great principles and doctrines of our holy Christianity. The great doctrine of entire sanctification was a blessed realization to his consciousness. For thirty-one years; with the exception of a short time, he enjoyed, and preached, and lived in this doctrine, and thus became during that time one of the most faithful and useful of God's servants. The last six months of brother Kinnear's life were months of great suffering, but they were months of gracious triumph. He seemed ready and anxious to weigh anchor, or mount his chariot for the heavenly world at all times. When questioned by his pastor and others as to his prospects, he would say, "there is not a cloud, not a doubt; no shadow; my title to heaven is as clear as a sunbeam. I feel all that inward holiness which Wesley preached, which Fletcher felt, and all that our church has ever claimed as the doctrine of entire holiness. I endorse this doctrine, now in the light of eternity. No tongue can describe the happiness which I feel. Though my poor body is wasted with disease, my soul is happy; so happy, that I can scarcely tell whether I am in the body or out of it. Glory, glory, glory, hallelujah. It is all of grace. Christ is all in all. Light is in my soul, and all around me—bright shining light. I can see a vista clear up to Heaven. I can almost touch the pearly gates of the New Jerusalem. I see angels. They have taken care of me through the night. Sing, 'They're round my bed, they're in my room.' With the simplicity of a child was combined the fullest measure of love, gratitude and humility. Praise sat upon his tongue, and often passed up into rapture.

We have given above a few of the words of our brother Kinnear, while on his dying couch. A small volume might be written of such things, said during his last illness. His triumph was perfect. Many came to see and hear, and receive his blessing, and he suffered no one to go without a word of exhortation, admonition or counsel. "Mark the perfect man," etc. Thus our beloved brother David Kinnear passed away on the 7th of May, about 7 o'clock, P. M. A large procession followed his corpse to the grave, and laid it away until God shall wake the sleeping dust, and bid it rise—immortal. Wm. B. Hines.

SAILING IN THE AIR.

The Duke of Argyll has given the sanction of his rank and his intelligence to a new society, which has been set up to conquer the difficulties of sailing in the air. The society held a general meeting on Wednesday evening, and read and discussed papers on aerial navigation and the flight of birds. How do birds fly? and how may men fly? or how may man, the sailor on the sea, become a sailor in the air? Truly a society of scientific and skillful men could scarcely propose to themselves a more interesting and useful, a bolder, or grander question.

The Duke of Argyll was deprived by illness of the pleasure of presiding over the meeting; but several papers were read. One of them showed how the principles of air-sailing found in the structure of birds might be applied to the use of man. Mr. Henry Bright explained his invention of an aerial screw, and Mr. Hurry a machine made of windmills moved by electro-magnetism. The principle of the screw as a restraining power was also explained and discussed. Discussions, however, are chiefly useful as stimulants to genius, and the decision will be made by some one who, having learned his lesson from a profound study of nature, shall defy contradiction and defeat prejudice by navigating the air.

Of course, the society expect plenty of banter. Dædalus and Icarus, their wings of feathers glued with wax, and their flight over the sea, and what befell Icarus for soaring too high, are mythological personages and incidents of which they made sure of being reminded. The Earl of Aldborough is reported to have written to say he would have already made a machine capable of transit through space, but for the difficulty of finding workmen able to put it together. Railway shareholders are, of course, assured that they need not as yet be in too great a hurry to throw their shares on the market, because many speculative inquirers have yielded to a fascination which has had away from fabulous ages to the present time. Dædalus however was, we learn the impersonation of manual art, and his son Icarus of imitative art, and therefore a jeering reference to them seems in the present day a compliment in disguise. However, it may be remarked by the way, that a wilder notion can scarcely enter any head than the supposition that railways and air-sailing can ever possibly come into competition.

As for the feat itself, by studying how animals do it, men may hope to be able to do it. Birds fly because they cannot help it. Flying is the instinct of their structure. They are made to do it, and they must do it. Man, however by his brain, more than makes up for the deficiencies of his organization. Anatomists may bring man down to a grade not much higher than the gorilla by comparing brains, for the superiority lies chiefly in the beauty of the form; but comparisons cease when we remember that man is the only animal endowed with genius. In this aspect of him he seems to be a world of himself, as far removed from the beasts almost as they are from the plants. And the slightest reflection on what this gift has enabled him to do will leave no doubt of his success in his efforts to become a sailor in the air. His hands and teeth do not fit him to be a flesh or root eater, but his brain having taught him how to hunt, dig, and cook, he can adapt many things to nourish him, and feed every day on rectified poisons. His brain having taught him how to travel by means of horses, ships, and carriages, and clothe himself in vegetable and animal fabrics, and shelter himself in houses, he has a geographical range nearly as extensive as all other animals put together. No doubt he is far from being as much at home in the water as a fish, or as free and easy in the air as a bird, but the time for these achievements is coming, and he must wait. Why, when the art of sailing in the air is mastered, although a great thing will have been done, it will not be a greater, if so great a thing as the combination of the fruits of genius which are deemed matters of course in a daily newspaper,—the creation of language, the making of paper, the invention of printing, magnetical messages, rapid presses, steam-drawn carriage, and postal communications.

The desire to sail in the air must be nearly as old as, if not older than the desire to sail on the water. "O that I had the wings of a dove!"—most likely was far from an original wish when uttered by the poetical King David. We know it to be once so strong in a pulpit orator as to make him regret his inferiority to a cormorant. Whilst enjoying a sail in a row-boat one summer day, and watching the sea fowl on the granite coast of Buchan, Dr. Chalmers exclaimed—"There, that cormorant is superior to me,—he is free of three elements, I of only one,—he flew in the air, he divide into the sea, and now he is perched again on the rock." And the flights of birds are full of marvels. The plunge of a gannet, if once seen, can never be forgotten. There are pelicans which, owing to the length of their wings, cannot float upon the water; and which yet are met with two hundred leagues from any land, a fact which seemingly proves that they can sustain an unresting flight of 400 leagues. The condor can rise four miles up into the air, and yet see a mouse on the ground. And if man, after thousands of years of inferiority, has far surpassed the condor and the lynx in seeing far and small things, he has only to persevere in his efforts to succeed in soaring high and flying far.

As they have wit enough, so mankind have pluck enough for this achievement. Future sailors in the air can never surpass the first in courage. Little more than eighty years ago the gifted but ill-fated James Tyler, the editor of the second edition of the Encyclopedia Britannica, was proving the practicability of ballooning by ascending from Comely Gardens, Edinburgh, in a fire balloon, stove and all, to a height of three hundred and fifty feet. Eighty years ago Vincent Lunardi frenzied the Scotch into a balloon mania by shooting up like a rocket two or three miles. "The wind," he was assured on one occasion, "will certainly blow you into the sea." "Me don't mind that," he replied, "somebody will pick me up." And truly enough he was fished out of the sea half dead, and six miles from land. Lunardi proved that a man could breathe at an elevation which, it was supposed, would make respiration impossible. After Lunardi, the air sailor who has contributed most to science is Mr. James Glaisher. He has provided the comparative worthlessness of our wind-gauges, and shown that temperature descends not proportionally to elevation, but by different ratios in different strata of air.

There is no difference in principle between sailing on water and sailing in air. Birds are air swimmers. Probably the explanation of their long, unresting flights is to be found in Mr. Glaisher's discovery. They float on starts of air, the relative specific gravity of which to the weight on their bodies may make floating on air as easy as floating on water is to swans. The flying fish is a fish built for short swims and shot flights. Fish are provided with small bladders, which float them. Birds float themselves in air (the gaseous form of water), because their bones and quills are filled with warm and light gases. But there are animals which have neither air-bags, like fishes, nor tubular bones like birds,—animals as wingless as man, which nevertheless have mastered the difficulties, or rather have been built to surmount the difficulties of air-sailing. Such are the powers of flying possessed by one species of spider that Dr. Martin Lister called it "the bird." There are spiders which sail in the air attached to balloons which they make of silk, inflate, and direct; and there are spiders which fly about on floats of filaments. A tiny black and gray spider is common on the South Coast in June, which any one may see spinning a float and then sailing away. When induced to get on the finger of the observer, and then held up in a current of air, this spider lets itself fall, hanging to a thread some six or eight inches long, and then it rises on the breeze until on a level with the finger, when it suddenly loosens the thread from its hold on the finger, and floats away. On the whole, it may be said that when scientific men explain thoroughly how animals, flying-fish, birds, squirrels, and especially spiders, sail in the air, men of skill will not be long behind in conquering the difficulties of aerial navigation.

Wonders of California.

The Geysers of California are unequalled among the hot springs of the world. They are reached by steamer across the bay from San Francisco to Petaluma; thence by stage for about fifty miles, over one of the finest farming regions of the State. From Foss's Station—a favorite resort among the mountains—the Geysers are twelve miles distant, and are reached by a wild, romantic road. For two miles it winds along the Hog-bark, a mountain summit like the ridge-pole of a steep roof. It has been leveled until barely wide enough for carriage wheels, and on each side one looks down precipitous banks for one or two thousand feet. If the wheels diverged ten inches from the track the lead of passengers would reach the bottom much in the condition of a bushel of apples after passing through a cider mill.

The ridges display the dense shrubbery of the manzanita or mountain mahogany, upon whose red juicy berries, grizzly bears subsist and travelers quench their thirst; the strongly spiced bay or pepper wood, which has the virtue of driving away fleas, and the exquisite madrona with a round fruit tasting like the dried thimble-berry. Here bears and antelopes offer great temptations to hunters.

The roar of the Geysers is heard, and their smoke seen two miles away, in favorable conditions of the atmosphere. After being whirled along a road which pitches down sixteen hundred feet, with thirty-five sharp turns in two miles, the visitor finds himself in a narrow valley, viewing hundreds of steam-jets puffing up from the ground. They are chiefly in a ravine half a mile long, known as the Devil's Cañon. Steep walls rise from fifty to one hundred and fifty feet, bare, spongy, ashy, clayey soil, without the faintest sign of grass or shrub. There are fully one thousand places where steam issues from the soil. Hot water often bubbles up above the surface; but much more startling and impressive is the boiling within hundreds of cavities under ground. One feels that only the flimsiest shell protects him from some vast subterranean cauldron. At times the ground vibrates so as to rattle crockery in the hotel one-third of a mile away. Hot, cold and boiling springs are found side by side, each with its own individual hue—blue, brown, black, red, green, yellow, pink or gray. Their constituents vary greatly, though soda, magnesia, Epsom salts, and various salts of iron, predominate.

In passing up the cañon, the visitor burns his fingers and receives stifling blasts from natural hot furnaces. He must be cautious where he steps, unless he would break through the crust into some of the scorching pools below. Steamboat Spring is grandest of all. It has no water, but consist entirely of steam puffing through an aperture as large as the body of a man, with a roar like a great steamship, the column rising up for hundreds of feet. The vent holes are two springs, a few feet apart, which will boil an egg in a minute and a half, and from which the steam escapes with great force. A stone, as large as a man's fist, thrown into one of them, rebounds three or four feet, like an India rubber ball.

These Springs are numerous for six miles along the Pluton River, and travelers declare that they far surpass the famed Geysers of Iceland. They are not volcanic, but result from chemical action. The smell of—brimstone, the hissing steam, throbbing waters, and underground roaring and trembling, are peculiarly diabolical. Indians regard them with the wildest terror, and cannot be persuaded to approach them; and some white visitors never dare to enter the cañon. They are among the most curious and wonderful of the many curiosities and wonders of the Pacific coast.

No other regions of equal area can boast half the natural beauties and marvels of California. Yosemite, the Sierras, Mount Shasta, the Big Trees, the Geysers, and Lake Tahoe—brightest gem in her mountain coronet—all are worthy of note among the most impressive features of the visible universe. Already they are sought annually by hundreds of foreigners, and the completion of the Pacific Railroad will make them the pleasure grounds of the world.

The railroad will be in running order between Brashar and Terrebonne by about the fifth of June. Captain Jarvis has been watching the road, staking cross-ties to keep them from washing off, and keeping things in order generally. They have plenty of hands, and as soon as the water is off the track, which will be the case in a week, repairs will proceed rapidly. President Seger has been doing his duty. He will spare no pains in his efforts to put the cars in motion at the earliest possible date. The Texas steamships will be put on the line as soon as the cars commence running.—Planters' Banner, 25th.

From "Good Words."
The Son Fretting against the Restraints of his Home.

The son spoken of is, like Adam,
a son of God.

I know that there are persons who would deny this. The creation claim of sonship, they say, is lost and gone: it is only by individual conversion that any one now can be a son of God. I do not quite think so. I think that in a true sense every created being, who has reason, and who has a soul, is a son of God. I think that in a yet higher sense every redeemed person—and is not redemption co-extensive with mankind?—is a son of God. And I think that, in a sense clearer and more personal still,
every one who is made a member of the Christian Church by baptism, is a son and child of God. "We are compelled by the Christian verity" so to speak. Sonship, in this application, is, of course, in some degree a figure: but we have the warrant of Scripture for this three-fold use of it, and it has a meaning, and it has a reality, and it has a power in it, in every one,
and in all of these applications.
"When ye pray, say, Our Father"
—without stopping to ask whether you, personally and individually, have entirely lived and felt and acted towards Him as a son. No man by well-doing can earn for himself a father: nor can any man,
by any unfaithfulness, quite cease to be a son. Even the prodigal, even in the far country, could say will, "I will arise and go to my father." Unfaithful, disobedient, exile, outcast, he was a son still.

So then I say, concerning each one of us, that there is a true claim and a real relation of sonship involved in these three things combined—creation, redemption, baptism. We are all God's children:
we have all a place in God's home.

What is the home? We might call the earth a home of God: so minute is His Providence over it,
so wonderful its marks of His presence, so near to every one of us
the very Person of Him in whom we all live and move and have our being. We might call each family
a home of God: so marvellous, so life-like is the representation and reproduction, in each, of some features of the Divine likeness—so instructive the working, in these poor, faint, feeble imitations, of His wisdom, His governance, His love.
But far more correctly do we designate the Church as God's home and household—using the very language of Scripture, and speaking now of a presence not natural, but spiritual; not of mere superintendence and governance, but of influence and inhabitation—of inworking,
both to will and to do—of indwell-
ing, both to cheer and to quicken, both to sanctify, and to enable, and to transform. "Whose house," Scripture says, "are we." "I will dwell in them and walk in them."

I will be a father unto you, and ye shall be my sons and daughters, saith the Lord Almighty.
Thus, then, we have the son and we have the home. We have the house of God, which is the Church of the living God—a society, not nominal but real—a vast body of living people, receiving the Bible
as their book of truth, acknowledging Christ as their only Saviour
and only Lord, signed and sealed
as His holy baptism, assembling themselves together to worship on the strength of His work and promise, and celebrating from time to time, in the congregation, that second special ordinance of His institution, which is the sacrament of the life, as the other was the sacrament of the Regeneration.
These are the sons, and this is the home, spoken of in our subject.
And we are all of us—not by profession only, but by right and title
—inside that home, children of that family. God has made us so, by promise and providence, by word and ordinance, by the call of His Gospel and by the sacrament of His consecration. I beseech you not to deal with Him so unthankfully
as to doubt this. Do not choose the outer darkness: do not deny,
gainsay, that Divine relationship which, without merit or quest of years, God himself has bestowed upon you: do not say, God is not towards Him as a son should: God has not brought me into His home,
because I find myself fretting against its rules and against its restraints. This is not humility;
this is rather the mask of pride and the expression of a childish, unfilial independence.

The work of humility is not this.
Humility is not shown in saying,
God has not done for me this and that; God has not taken me for His son, nor set upon me the seal of the inheritance and the adoption.
Rather is humility seen in this other and most opposite confession
—God has done all for me, and I would not! God took me for His own child by adoption, and I fretted against Him and would none of Him! Yes, there is room enough for humility there! and this is a wholesome and genuine humility,

as the other is morbid, and spurious,
and untrue.

The home of God, then, in the third place, has its restraints.
Every one who would dwell within God's family is bound to keep its rules. Like other homes it has its hours of refreshment and worship,
its conditions of conduct and companionship, its regulations of speech
and work, its requirements of duty,
and its punishment of transgression.
And all these things, though good in themselves, are of the nature of checks and thwartings to the fallen Adam.

Take an example or two.
The life of the soul depends upon communion with God. The Gospel invites us to the free and loving exercise of this communion. The ordinance of prayer, in private and in the congregation—the ordinance of devout study of God's word—the ordinance of self-examination and meditation in holy things—the ordinance of humble and regular participation in the sacrament of the Lord's Supper—all these are delights and privileges to the established Christian; but they are commands and duties too—rules of the Divine household, restraints upon that unbounded exercise of the free-will which can not be trusted to know its own good, or to seek its own good, without direction and without compulsion from the Head and Lord of the Church. All these things begin as duties for most men; by degrees they become habits, and then by degrees they become pleasures. But for most men they begin by being acts of obedience, rendered in reliance upon promise and in gratitude for redemption.

Now who is there who has not fretted sometimes against these rules of the home? Where is the young man who has not often departed—departed sometimes for long seasons—from the rule of prayer? Where is he who has not said in his heart, This necessity of devotion is irksome—let it alone?
Sons of the home—if indeed redemption and baptism make us so—are absent for years and months
from the meals, from the refreshments of the family: the Lord's Table is almost empty of its guests,
and the daily prayers of the home
are deserted utterly by the children.

It needs a second adoption—it needs a conversion, most often,
even for those who never were aliens—to recall the unruly, disobedient son, from a wandering which has been all inside the home.

Again, our Lord Jesus Christ has distinctly warned us of the need of abstinence, on the part of God's children, from all those fleshly and sinful lusts which (He says) wars against the soul. This is one of the rules, one of the restraints, of the home. Yet who is there who submits himself readily, thoroughly,
and of a glad will, to this severe self-discipline? How many are they who say in their hearts, "Why this extreme strictness? why may not I, like other men, just taste at least, just enjoy for a season, the pleasures of sin? why strain to this utmost limit the conditions of Christianity and the Gospel? A short time shall suffice me—but for a short time, or if not in act, yet in thought, let me know what it is to be my own master, to be trusted,
to be free!" Yes, it is the old story:
the tempter comes to us still, as he came in Eden, with the insidious suggestion, "Yea, hath God said, Ye shall not eat of every tree of the garden?" Is it so that the Creator, that the Redeemer, has hounded you in with these restrictions of speech and action, when He knows all the while that, if you were but free from these fetters,
you might be as gods, knowing good and evil? Alas! if He wished your happiness—if He desired the development of your whole being in the limitless regions of power and gladness, He would have left no one tree under the ban of this arbitrary prohibition—He would have allowed you, He would have bidden you to eat, without stint or precaution, of the tree of knowledge
and of the tree of life!

The son listens. O how readily and frets thenceforth against the restraints of his home!

One other reflection springs out of the former.

A watchful home is obliged to use some caution as to the admission of books. It is one part of the duty—not always attended to—of a Christian parent, to watch over the literature which is in large part to form the principles, as well as to gratify the taste, of the young.
There lies a serious responsibility upon the heads of each family; to maintain a sufficient familiarity with the current writings of the day, to be able to say with decision and with intelligence, This book shall not enter my doors, and this other shall be welcome. In general, there is both an ignorant exclusion, and then, on the other side,
as its natural accompaniment, a no less ignorant admission. A must be so. All parents are not readers:

and all readers are not judges.

But the experience itself illustrates one of the restraints of the Divine Home. The narrative of man's life in Paradise seems to indicate to us a restriction even then upon his knowledge. The one tree from which he was debarred was the tree of knowledge of good and evil. Of that tree man has eaten—and by reason of it sin entered into the world, and death by sin. But yet, though it be too late to keep from any man the general knowledge of evil, it is not too late to limit and fence for each man the familiarity with what Holy Scripture calls "the depths of Satan."
Such knowledge is not necessary
for us—conscience will warn us, without minute foresight, when danger is threatening: the knowledge of the mystery of evil is not needed, and it is in itself debasing and defiling. Let the son of God's House keep not only the conscience,
but (so far as it may be) the understanding pure. If fallen nature frets under the restraint, let the ambition of grace answer it. If I, through mercy, am to be (as God promises) a partaker of the Divine nature, I must flee away, in its every form, from the corruption that is in the world through lust!

It is of the first risings of discontent within against the restraints of God's Home that we speak now.
We are not to tell now of the flight nor of the exile. We are only to seek to awaken, through grace, the wholesome dread of murmuring,
even in thought, against the safeguards with which God has surrounded us. Let us say to ourselves, when prayer is irksome to us, when the Bible refuses to open
—when some sinful thought seems pleasant, when the companionship of an unprincipled friend looks at once joyous and harmless—when some difficult duty has to be done,
or some strong inclination to be striven with unto the death—let us say to ourselves then, This is the mark of my being in God's Home—
I have to do this, I have to bear this, against my natural wish, just because I have the joy and the glory of being one of Christ's redeemed, one of God's sons: this little struggle, this severe conflict, is a sign that I am on the way to glory. I will not fret against the restraints of my home, but rather bless God for everything which He makes a sign and proof of my son-ship; praying him not to suffer me to depart from His house, but to dwell there all my brief lifetime,
setting forth His praise, and receiving more and more upon my soul the likeness and the impress of His glory! "One thing have I desired of the Lord—that will I seek after: that I may dwell in the house of the Lord all the days of my life, to behold the beauty of the Lord, and to inquire in His temple."
So, "when my father and my mother forsake me, the Lord will take me up." So, "when the earthly house of this tabernacle is dissolved," I shall "have a building of God—a house not made with hands,
eternal in the heavens."

IN MEMORIAM.

REV. WM. A. SMITH.

Bro. Jones: The melancholy task devolves upon me to record this sad tribute to the memory of my most dearly beloved brother, who departed this life, in hope of a blessed immortality, in the city of Austin, at 4 o'clock A. M., on Friday, the 4th inst., in the fifty-eighth year
of his age, having been thirty-six years a traveling preacher.

Rev. William Anderson Smith, son of Joshua and Mary Smith, was born near Springfield, Robinson county, Tennessee, on the 23d day of March, 1809. About this time, or perhaps a few years later, our parents embraced the doctrines and usages of Methodism, and therefore, had their entire infantile family dedicated to God in holy Christian baptism, the vitality of which none of us, in riper years, have for a moment called in question.

From this period up to the day of our father's death, his house was ever a welcome home for the ministers of the Lord Jesus Christ. In the year 1819 our parents moved from Tennessee to North Alabama, Lauderdale county, and settled in what was then known as the New Purchase, and which was a new and sparsely settled country. But very soon the Methodist itinerant preachers found their way into our new settlement, and our father's log cabin, with its dirt floor and rude benches made of split logs, became the pioneer church in the wilderness. Thus we were brought up in the gospel nursery, and our earliest recollections were intimately associated with the Methodist ministry and the means of grace.

My brother was converted to God in the fall of 1828, at a protracted meeting held on Blower Creek,
by Elias Tidwell and Joseph Miller,
who were the preachers on "Shoul-circuit, Tennessee Conference. He joined the church while on his knees at the mourners' bench, before his conversion, a step which he never afterwards had cause to regret. He did not become fully satisfied of his acceptance with God,

until some time in the year 1829,
the principal part of which was spent away from home at school.
In 1830 he was licensed to preach, having served for some time in the capacity of class-leader and exhorter. In November of this year he was admitted on trial in the Tennessee Conference, having worked through the summer at ten dollars a month to enable him to procure his itinerant outfit. In 1831
he was junior preacher on Wayne circuit, with Rev. Wm. E. Doty as his colleague. In 1832 he traveled Richland circuit with Rev. E. Tidwell, his spiritual father, for his colleague. At the next session of the Conference he received a transfer to the Alabama Conference, and was present at its first session, which was held in Tuscaloosa, then
the capital of the State, in 1832.

In this Conference he received eighteen regular annual appointments, including missions, circuits,
and stations, and the last four years he was Presiding Elder of Gainsville District. During this time he traveled over and preached in nearly every part of South Alabama, including portions of Mississippi and Florida.

In December, 1850, he asked for and obtained a transfer to the Texas Conference, in which he received
ten regular annual appointments.
In the summer of 1860, however,
while on the Burnett county Mission, his lungs gave way under the influence of constant exposure and labor, since which time he had sustained a superannuated relation to the Conference. When no longer able to serve the church, he, for several years, served the State as Principal of the Institution for the Blind.

On the 7th of September, 1837,
he was united by marriage to Julia
A. Hamilton, who for over twenty-nine years has been his companion
and the sharer of his joys and sorrows, his toils and privations, and who survives to mourn his loss.

It does not become me to eulogize
the character of my dear departed
brother; this I shall leave to others.
His record is before the church and the world, and we leave it in their keeping. His earthly heritage has been poverty, toil, privation, and bereavement; but I thank God that there is, in heaven, rest for the weary soul, where no waves of sorrow ever roll.

The last letter he ever wrote, as I suppose, was written to myself,
and was received during the late session of our Conference at Galveston, and now lies before me. In this letter he says: "You may tell the Conference that my faith wavers
not—I am ready for my final change—
Christ is my Rock, my refuge, my
All. My heart is with them, but weakness and want of funds prevent my attendance at Conference."
His end was peace. Though a great sufferer, he complained not—murmured not. His faith sustained him to the last moment. "O, that I could have been there to have caught the last whispers of his departing, blood-washed spirit!"

His favorite song was, "O, sing to me of heaven, when I am called to die," and O, how I have seen his face glow with holy rapture when,
before he lost his voice, he would sing those sweet words:

"La Cœlis charm me last on earth,
And greet me first in heaven."

Farewell, farewell, my dear
sainted brother, until we meet again in that

"land of pure delight,
Where saints immortal reign;
Infinite day excludes the night,
And pleasures banish pain."

THE MAGNETIC LIGHT AT SEA.—The American Magnesium Company, of Boston, have lately exhibited an apparatus showing the adaptation of the magnesium light for signaling at sea. They claim that the light from a lamp constructed in the same manner as the one exhibited has been seen at a distance of sixty-five miles. The great difficulty hitherto with the magnesium light has been the instability of the flame, owing to the want of some mechanical arrangement whereby the flame could be properly fed with the metallic strip. This has now been completely overcome by a delicate clock-work arrangement;
the delicate ribbon of magnesium is given off in just sufficient quantity to supply a steady and most brilliant flame. It is stated that the main obstacle to a more general use of magnesium as an illuminator is fast disappearing, the difficulty being the expense of the material. Not long ago the manufactured strips of metal which are burned to produce the flame cost $16 per ounce; they now sell for $3.50. As the consumption increases and manufacturers become more experienced, the price continues to fall, as the supply is unlimited.—Journal of Applied

Open Communion.

"The Lord's Supper for the Lord's People."

BY A BAPTIST CLERGYMAN.

"Touching my practice as to communion with visible saints, although not baptized with water, I say it is my present judgment so to do, and am willing to render a farther reason thereof, shall I see the leading hand of God thereto."
—John Bunyan.

"There is no position in the whole compass of theology, of the truth of which I feel a stronger persuasion, than that no man, or set of men, is entitled to prescribe,
as an indispensable condition of communion, what the New Testament has not enjoined as a condition of salvation."—Robert Hall.

PREREQUISITENESS OF BAPTISM AN OLD PRINCIPLE.

Finally, it is said, to deny that baptism is an indispensable term of communion is to depart from an established principle held by all the Calvinistic Pedobaptist churches of the world, and to set one's self against a most current doctrine of the past. This objection, however, cannot be very weighty with such "extreme Protestants" as the Baptists are, for it is in effect the same objection that the Pedobaptist raises against the position of the Baptists upon the subject of infant baptism. But, after all, we are not so clear that our Pedobaptist friends do so unexceptionably
as is represented, regard baptism
as an indispensable prerequisite to the Lord's Supper. We have found, in our intercourse with them, very notable and numerous exceptions.
In the preface to the second edition of his work on "Sacramental Communion on Catholic Principles," Mr. John M. Mason said: "Differences, be they what they may, are insufficient to justify want of communion between those that mutually own and honor each other's Christianity." Elsewhere
he gave "a sure and easy rule of conscience in regard to church fellowship, namely, no particular act of communion is to be interpreted as reaching beyond itself, unless coupled with other acts by an express or known condition." And he commended Robert Hall's position, and hoped much from it.
Heretofore Baptists have, when attacked in regard to their strict communion, replied that on the ground maintained by Pedobaptist churches—themselves, they are abundantly vindicated in their custom. And so they are, if all are right in holding that baptism is an essential prerequisite to the Supper; for upon that principle
the Baptists are not any more
"close" than the Pedobaptists.
They only define baptism differ-ently, and, as they believe, Scripturally. But ought we not to go back of the position held heretofore by many Pedobaptist churches on the prerequisites of baptism in order to the Supper, and inquire whether they have been right in that principle. Let us thoroughly make the inquiry, and not shrink back from any result to which our investigations may conduct us;
though that result be at variance
with a hoary theory of the past.
If we can find a sound conclusion against the old theory, we should rather rejoice, for, if adhered to,
it must forever separate Baptists
and Pedobaptists at the Lord's table.

FEVERS VERSUS FRUITS.

Let's have a little talk about orchards and gardens as life-preservers. Many a farmer thinks he "can't fuss about a garden" with vegetables and small fruits in an apartment, hardly about an orchard, especially beyond apple trees. So he goes on to weightier matters of grain, or stock, or dairy, and eats potatoes, wheat bread, pork, and salt-beef, all summer long. No fine variety of vegetables, no grateful berries, no luscious peaches or juicy cherries. By October fever comes, or bowel complaints of some kind, or some congestive troubles
most likely. He is laid up, work stops a month, the doctor comes,
and he "drugs round" all winter,
and the doctor's bill drags too.
The poor wife, meanwhile, gets dyspeptic, constipated, has fever
too, perhaps, and she "just crawls round." What's the matter? They don't know, poor souls. Would they build a hot fire in July and shut the doors? Of course not—in their rooms; but they have done
just that in their poor stomachs.
How so? They have been eating,
all summer, the heat-producing food, fit for a cold season, but not for a warm one. A Greenlander can eat candles and whale fat, because they create heat. In January we are up towards Greenland—in climate.

A Hindoo lives on rice, juicy

fruits, and tropic vegetables, cooling and opening to the system. In July we move towards Hindostan, in a heat almost tropical. Diet must change too.

Have apples, pears, cherries,
etc., from the orchard every day, of early and late kinds. Let there be plenty of good vegetables, raspberries, strawberries, etc. It takes a little time and trouble, but it's the cheapest way to pay the doctor's bills.
And, bless your dear souls, these things taste good!

You study what feed is good for pigs and cattle. All right; but wife and children are of higher consequence; and it's a shame if, with all our great gifts of intellect and intuition, we do not obey the divine laws in our own physical being so well that the doctor shall visit the house less than the horse-doctor goes to the barn. Don't fail of vegetables, berries, and fruits.
Try it, and you'll say we haven't told half the truth.—New York

The Booth Diary—Is it a Forgery?

We copy the following communication from the New York World,
of the 22d:

The newspapers print what purports to be the diary of John Wilkes Booth. After an examination of the document I have no hesitation in pronouncing this pretended diary a forgery.

It was probably written, at the instigation of the detective Baker,
by some newspaper correspondent.
It bears in every line the marks of invention. In some places this is overdone. Booth is made to say:
"I shouted 'sic semper' before I fired." It is absurd to suppose that the real Booth would have written such a thing. Again: "In jumping, I broke my leg. I rode sixty miles that night with the bone of my leg tearing the flesh at every jump." Then,
the bone of his leg still tearing
his flesh, enemies on every side,
all the crossings guarded, the fatal
circle of foes steadily closing in,
every second of time of incalculable
value, the necessity of devoting every faculty to the business of escape a matter of absolute vital importance, Booth sits down to write several hundred words of maudlin non sense. There is hardly a semblance of reality in that "diary." It is just such a work as an ingenious sensational correspondent
might have produced.

But what necessity for forging a diary? One or two things is true.
Either Baker and his associates killed the wrong man, or, killing the right man, they forged this diary in order to magnify the importance of their deed and the importance of the supposed plot which resulted in assassination. If one supposes that they killed the wrong man, a dozen mysterious circumstances are explained. Then one understands why the story that Booth is still alive is so frequently reaffirmed;
why men, apparently responsible,
deliberately announce that they have seen him; why the corpse of the supposed assassin was so mysteriously hurried into a concealed pit; why even the clothing of the supposed Booth was destroyed; why there was everywhere a labored attempt to prove that Booth had indeed been killed.

It is reasonable plain that there was no "plot," in the true meaning of the term, for the assassination of Mr. Lincoln. A great deal of party capital has been made out of the supposition that there was a gigantic, far-reaching, carefully elaborated conspiracy. But no evidence in support of the assertion has been produced. To be sure, Baker says
there was a plot; but Baker forged the ridiculous story about the attempted suicide of Wirz. Conover says there was a plot; but Conover
has been convicted of perjury. St.
Marie says that Suratt has said
there was a plot; but it is the opinion of the mass of thinking men that St. Marie is another Conover;
the officers of the Government evidently think so. It suits the purpose of Radical politicians to keep up the sensation about a vast conspiracy. But there is not an atom of proof that any such conspiracy has ever had existence.

Secretary Stanton and Baker know who forged that diary, if forged it is. Stanton says the book was brought to his house by Baker
a few days after the death of Booth.
Baker got it—where? Did he not procure it to be written, as he procured the Wirz story to be written, by a newspaper correspondent?
If so, why?

But what the necessity for forgery? These are questions that must be answered sooner or later.

An Indian passing up the streets of Natchez, a few days since, was asked the relative position of white man, negro and Indian. Giving a usual "Ugh!" he said, "Fore the war, fast cum white man den injin, den dog, den nigger; now, cum nigger, den dog, den injin, and white man last."

HOW TO SEND MONEY.—We are frequently receiving enquiries upon this point. We have scarcely lost anything by the mails, and consider them safe. The risk at any rate will be ours.

We are still asked shall we forward money by mail? Answer, YES. The Agent will notice, as above, that the risk is not his.

TO SUBSCRIBERS.—Any person wishing to subscribe for this paper can do so, by paying the Methodist preacher in the circuit, and forwarding to us his receipt for three dollars, with the address of the subscriber upon it, stating Post office, State, Circuit, and Congregation. The receipt ought to be taken in duplicate.

BATON ROUGE CHURCH.

The friends of Southern Methodism everywhere will be glad to learn that the amount necessary to relieve this Church of its indebtedness to the State Bank has been collected. One fourth of it was given by the good people of Baton Rouge, and three fourths by those of New Orleans. If we did not know the aversion which these liberal minded donors have to charitable parade, we should with great pleasure record the names of those who, at a time of unprecedented financial pressure, have come forward to secure to our Church this beautiful building. As our Northern brethren had ordered its photograph, we suppose they, too, will rejoice with us.

COMMENCEMENT.—Centenary College Commencement will take place on the 10th of July. The President reports encouragingly. Eighty students are in attendance. The meeting of the Board of Trustees and Visitors will be held on the 8th of July. Friends of this Institution and the Visiting Committees of the Patronizing Conferences are specially invited. On Sabbath, the 7th of July, the Rev. Dr. Walker will preach the Commencement Sermon. D. V. J. C. KEENER, Pres. Bd. Trustees and Visitors.

MOTHER OF GOD.

These words always upon the lips of Catholics, fall upon the ears of Protestants with the shock of blasphemy. The earliest lisps of Catholic children are to Mary, to "Mary, Mother of God." To a little child the idea of God's mother must suggest one superior in authority to God himself. No one can doubt, who has ever heard these lisps, or those "Hail Marys" of Catholic youths at their first communion, but that their whole heart and mind is directed to "Mary," to Mary as an invisible and all-powerful spirit. Prayers to her are uttered again and again, in preference to any other form of prayer, as if in the bosom of Mary dwelt love, compassion, and sympathy such as the human heart earnestly craves. She is the preferred mediator. Her image of beauty is called up; her grief at the death of Christ; and her motherly tenderness. The maiden, and the young child, and all who seek pity with protection, are encouraged to repose directly upon her as their natural friend, who, having great interest in heaven, will shield them from all evil. St. Paul's declaration that there is "one mediator," as there is "one God and Father of us all" and "one Spirit," is entirely ignored by this sentimental trust in Mary. He was not a Catholic, for he never addressed Mary, or even so much as mentions her name in all his holy Epistles. He often addresses God, and Christ, and the Holy Spirit by name, by a variety of names; but in all his writings never so much as mentions Mary. The titles of Christ, as recorded by the Apostle, are among the sublimest syllables of inspired truth. He calls him, the Beloved of God, the Brightness of the Father's glory, the First Born, the First Begotten of the Dead, the Heir of All Things, the Image of the Invisible God, the Mediator, Melchizedek, the Power of God, the Saviour, the Second Man, the Wisdom of God, but never the "Son of Mary."

St. Peter was with Mary at the marriage in Cana; he and the other disciples "continued in prayer and supplication with the women, and Mary, the mother of Jesus, and with his brethren," in the upper room at Jerusalem directly after the crucifixion. But in all his Epistles he never so much as alludes to her. The name of "Christ" is often upon his lips. He exhorts the "royal priesthood" to offer "spiritual sacrifices," he enforces prayer, but does not bestow a passing thought on "Mary." He was, in this respect, a poor Catholic. And the same is true of St. John, who took Mary to his own house upon the death of Jesus. He calls Christ the Only Begotten of the Father, the Offspring of David, the Son of God, the Lamb of God, but never the "Son of Mary." In this respect these inspired men were not Catholics; for Catholics have the name of Mary always upon their lips, but these holy men never. Though they wrote expressly upon salvation, and prayer, and a mediator, and intercession, and giving of thanks, they have never so much as hinted that any of these things are to be done through Mary. But they have expressly said that there is "one Mediator, the man Christ Jesus." "But this man, because he continueth ever, hath an unchangeable priesthood." "For the law maketh men high-priests which have infirmity; but the word of the oath maketh the Son who is consecrated for evermore." This language of St. Paul forever settles whether any man or any woman can be addressed as a mediator without blasphemy. Such prayer places such saints in the place of Christ, and displaces

the Son of God from the mediatorial position which he truly fills in the heavens, and in the hearts of all true worshippers. To prostrate oneself before any angel or saint is forbidden. When St. John was overwhelmed by the glorious form and presence of the angelic being who conversed with him, he says, "I fell at his feet to worship him. And he said unto me, 'See thou do it not: * * * worship God.'" St. Paul cautions the Colossians, "Let no man beguile you in the worshipping of angels."

Catholics say they do not worship angels or Mary, they only request the saints to pray for them, as we commonly do good men. This plea is disingenuous. There is a great difference between requesting good men to pray for us, and praying to them to do it. The former has not even the appearance of idolatry, and has never been open to suspicion of it: the latter is preferred in the place, time, with the posture, in the language, and with all the circumstances and formalities of divine worship. When these "good men" are saints in the world of spirits, we can not be sure that they hear us without ascribing to them the attributes of the Almighty. It may be doubted if the saints know any thing that is done on earth. St. Augustine says, "They know no more what we do on earth than we know what they do in heaven." The intercession by saints and angels is against the spirit and letter of our religion. It trenches on the incommunicable prerogatives of Him "who ever liveth to make intercession for us."

But breviaries, litanies, and books of devotion show that those who address "confessors," "apostles," "martyrs," and the "mother of God," supplicate those saints to befriend them by their own inherent power, or to intercede for them by virtue of their own personal merits. In J. H. Newman's Essay on Development, speaking of the saints, he says, "Christ communicates to them his nature that it may deify them. They become instinct with his life, of one body with his flesh, sons, kings, gods"—page 402. He heads several pages Deification of the Virgin Mary: Deification of the Saints. Pope Gregory XVI, in his bull of August 15, 1832, speaks of the Virgin Mary "as watching over him," "leading his mind, by her heavenly influence, to those counsels most salutary to Christ's flock"—"but," he concludes, "that all may have a successful and happy issue, let us raise our eyes to the most blessed Virgin Mary, who alone destroys heresies, who is our greatest hope, yea, the entire ground of our hope." This is the head of the Catholic Church, ascribing the attributes of God to Mary. Yet Catholics are very fond of saying that they do not worship Mary. Bonaventura, one of their leading divines, has actually accommodated the devotional Psalms to the Virgin Mary—"Have mercy on me, O Lady, according to thy compassion; cleanse me from my sin," etc.—50 Psalm. It is evident that Mary has a place in the worship of the Roman Catholic Church which Protestants accord only to "the God and the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ."

NEW ADVERTISEMENTS.

MRS. DYER'S BOARDING HOUSE, No. 174 Camp Street, above Girod. Mrs. Dyer's continues to be the headquarters of a large number of our Southern Methodist Friends. She keeps an excellent table, and her house is most conveniently situated for business men, and for families visiting the city. We recommend it most heartily.

FRANK L. RICHARDSON, Esq., the son of the Hon. T. L. Richardson, of St. Mary's, opens a law office at No. 5 Commercial Place.

HONDURAS.

It is a great mistake to suppose that the editor of the ADVOCATE drinks whiskey because he advertises it. We "labored" with brethren on this point last week. So it does not follow because we have published, and shall still continue to publish news, reliable news, from Honduras, that we advise our people to go there. We advise them to go nowhere; we have never advised a man, and five children, to move even across a creek; nor intend to, because, by the time a man has five children, it is to be presumed he knows something, and a good deal more, so far as his family is concerned, than anybody else.

A brother wishes for "light" in the following quantity and directions: the probable amount it would take to emigrate a family, and subsist them there until they could raise from the ground a support—if there are building timbers in sufficient quantities for practicable purposes—if they use wells—if the wells are fresh or brackish—in a word, the character of the drinking water—how it is got, and how it is to be kept—how the lands are to be fenced—if the lands are easily prepared.

Another writes to know "if there is any thing I could turn my hand to." A good saw-mill mechanic wishes to know if there is room out there for a mill, is poor and would like to receive aid to get there. "Can mechanics get employment there, and at how much per month or day, smiths and carpenters; and if tools are as cheap, or cheaper, there than here." What land can be bought for per acre; in fact, give him a full description of country, climate, soil, productions of timber, fowls, fish, cattle, hogs, mineral wealth, manners and customs of the people, diseases, state of civilization among the negroes, religion, schools, by whom, and "if the till of land would be good."

"Do you know any thing personally of the health, the insects, etc., of British Honduras?" Quite a number of itinerant preachers, each one supposing that he is alone in the request, wishes to know what chance there is for a circuit preacher.

Judging from the letters which daily arrive, the whole country is loosening up with a view of migrating to British Honduras. Our advice to every man is, "If you wish to go anywhere with a family, first go alone and see for yourself." Then you will know for yourself, and blame no one in the event that things do not turn out as you had imagined." Passage there $50, back $50: see advertisement of vessel.

It would require the services of a Secretary for Honduras, in this office, to answer the inquiries that pour in daily. When it is remembered that we have never been any nearer the tropics than this city, the difficulty of answering from personal knowledge can be appreciated. We know nothing, absolutely nothing, beyond the articles published in this paper on the subject of Honduras. Yes, we do know one thing, we saw a gentleman from there who had just picked out a couple of chiggers from his feet; and we saw the sack of one of these insects, an oblong, about the size of two bird shots. They had been in his feet for six weeks. He thought them pegs in his shoes. This insect lays its egg just beneath the cuticle, which develops in a sack. This sack, if broken, develops into a number of other sacks, and the feet are often honeycombed by the insect. A traveler tells us that in New Granada one half of the people have lost their toe-nails from this insect. The gentleman who took out these chiggers assured us that they were scarcely known in British Honduras, and that the danger from them, and the inconvenience, are greatly exaggerated. While we write the Supercargo of the Sherman has come in, and says that in Belize they drink cistern water; in the country there is an abundance of good water and timber. We write this much, in answer to the many letters of this week. The Sherman leaves again on the 29th of June for Honduras.

Opinions of the Attorney-General on the Congressional Military Bills.

We gave last week a summary of this elaborate document prepared by the editor of the Pioneer; also the opinions of the Times and the Crescent. The sum of the whole matter is this—the "opinion" is for the guidance of the citizen rather than registrars; the whole interpretation is left to the applicant; he is to decide for himself whether he is authorized by the law to take the prescribed oath; with this registrars have nothing to do; their business is merely to administer the oath; if any man takes it, votes, and has sworn falsely, the registrars can not decide upon the fact whether he has sworn truly or falsely; that is reserved for such courts as may hereafter have jurisdiction to try him upon a charge for perjury.

If our people neglect to register now, it will be their own fault. If they do not get their names down upon the register, they can not vote; and it is quite probable they will be set down as "unwilling to reconstruct," and lose all citizenship for the next ten years. If, by any injustice of Congress, or radicalism of the Convention, they should be deprived of representation, even after registering and voting, there will remain to them the consciousness of having done all in their power to rescue the country from the evils of unlimited negro enfranchisement, and the unprincipled designs of color-maniacs.

GEN. LONGSTREET.—Among other striking items of political news we record that Gen. Longstreet has written a letter giving in his adherence to the Black Republican party. Some weeks ago he sat on the platform in this city from which Senator Wilson spoke. We conclude that he affiliates with that part of the Republican party of which Wilson is the exponent. The haste with which many of our Southern men accept new issues, and espouse new sides, has been one of the characteristics of the times, not the least of our misfortunes. They seem to think that something must be done. It occurs to us that a people as completely at the mercy of others as we are, need not be in haste to take position. We can afford to wait; at least until we can see where we are. A man may be great in the field, but weak in council.

METHODIST PRESS.

The weekly publications of all the branches of the Methodist Church amount to the number of fifty-one, of which twenty are published by the M. E. Church and its missions; thirteen by the M. E. Church, South; one each by the two bodies of African Methodists. The non-Episcopal Methodist Churches of the United States publish five papers, and those of Canada four. In Great Britain, we find four, in Australia two, and in France one. We thus see how far in advance American Methodism is, of Methodism in other countries, in the use of the influence wielded by the press.

THE WESTMINSTER REVIEW, for April has also come to hand. Its contents are as follows, viz: Italy and the War of 1866; The Papal Drama; Thos. Hobbes; Contemporary Music and Musical Literature; New America; Mr. Swinburne's Poetry; The Hopes and Fears of Reformers; Contemporary Literature.

The above Reviews are republished by the Leonard Scott Publishing Company, New York.

THE NORTH BRITISH REVIEW, for March has come to hand. It contains the following articles, viz: The Policy of Trade Unions; George Buchanan; The Political Writings of Richard Cobden; On the Character of the Old Northern Party; Victor Cousin; The Oyster Fisheries; Oxford University Extension; The Bengal Famine of 1866.

Wesleyan Missionary Anniversary.

The announcement of the name of Charles Garrett was the signal for a hour he kept sustained hold of the spirit of great missionaries throbbing hearts. But the most important duty of the Church to provide for the absolute prerogative of God and the right men. The Divine purposes, was forcibly illustrated by examples of Moses, and David, and Luther, and Wesley, and Carey, and Pierce.

BRINGING THE MEN TO THE CROSS.

We give, as a sample of the concluding sentences, the vast surging and throbbing under the orator's heart: "I believe that our luxuries must be placed to others' necessities, and necessities must give place to others' necessities. It must come to this: when it does, there will be no more of pumping; the money will bubble itself. I am tired of pumping; it is one's arm ache so: we shall then sacrifice. Where is the one man who is prepared to make a sacrifice year? Who is there among the who will do without a new bonnet, if they were to do without altogether, they would scarcely be able to do so. Where is there any one who will be prepared to make a sacrifice—that point—a sacrifice for Christ? O! instead of spasmodic giving, we had a steady giving; the whole case would be let us say, here is a pound a week Jesus Christ. If all our members friends were to do that, and more friends give more than our members should soon have a million of pounds. Gentlemen, shall we do this? I sight of a perishing world shall we do it? It seems to me that we want in every circuit is an earnest lover of missions. There is no thing without enthusiasm. Let us have men who think, pray, and cease tormenting every body about missions, who, in short, are always at next year we shall have an income our secretaries never contemplated fondest dreams. Having achieved we must then look up. At the the Alma, we are told, when our regiments were being beaten back borders of Russia, the ensign in front his ground as the troops retreated captain shouted to him to bring his colors; but the reply of the ensign was 'Bring up the men to the colors.' There is George Percy yonder before colors."

I feel, today as if I were a Methodist every where. What saying will, through the agency of friends, the reporters, be read by ladies in the most distant lands, and mothers whose faces are gray, and whose hearts are sinking, hands, with them in God's name, your name. I say, through the my friends here—I say to them, name—that they are not forgotten, not be forsaken. Is it so? Shall the ends of the world, so that every man who reads it shall say, 'I forgotten in Exeter Hall. They leave me here to die?' That, that cheer. I take it that it is not but the missionaries' yonder. Our love to them. Let us bring up to the colors. Don't say, 'Percy, come back,' but cry, 'Of England, come on!' And our Church shall awake, shake her dust, and put on her battle garments, then shall she go forth to glorious Master's work; and the seventh angel sound, and three great voices in heaven saying, 'The domes of this world are become the domes of our Lord, and of his God: he shall reign forever and ever.'

The attitude of the Papacy that of unyielding hostility. It is said that the great ambassadors and consuls of Powers in Rome earnestly pressed the attention of his Holiness to the necessity of a reconciliation King Victor Emmanuel, and the majority of the cardinals are inclined to a compromise the Pope and Antonelli, in view of prudent counsel propose coming out in force forthcoming summer convocation the bishops from all ends ear thin Rome, against the Cardian d'Andrea, who for connected with his health, venture back to Rome for Neapolitan air and who Pope, in defiance of the councils of Trent, has without trial. Sigarot has about to return to Florence, accomplished exactly nothing.

A large number of monks priests in Italy have taken tige of the new privileges upon them by the new law marriages, and have rung wedlock with unexpected even the nuns have caught fection, and the matrimonial threatens to complete the of the convents begun by law.

OBITUARIES.

Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord, this is the voice that speaks from heaven, to cheer the bereaved of earth; and nothing but the voice of God, pronouncing a benediction upon the righteous dead, could dispel the gloom of the grave, and comfort the stricken, and disperse late heart. Nothing less than this, could console the husband of her whose memory is blessed, and whose loss is irreparable.

Many hearts will be made sad, and many eyes moisten with tears at the announcement of the death of Mrs. Dicy T. Read, consort of John Read, Esq., which occurred on the 23rd April, 1867, at the residence of her son, in Carroll county, Miss., whither she had gone on a visit. Sister Read was the daughter of John and Martha Dukes, and was born in Davidson county, Tenn., and when a child, moved to Montgomery county. She was united in marriage to John Read, when only seven years of age, afterwards moved to Tuscaloosa county, Ala., where she became the subject of converting grace, under the ministry of Rev. Joshua Boncher, and united with the Methodist Church, of which she was a consistent, pious and devoted member for forty years, when she exchanged the church militant for the church triumphant. In 1828, with her husband she removed to Mississippi, where she resided at the time of her death. She had been married over fifty years, and was the mother of nine children, all of whom had preceded her to heaven, but two, and they are following on in her footsteps to the "land of the blest." She leaves a devoted husband, who is "looking for that blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ." Two children, twenty odd grand children, two great grand children, and a large circle of friends to mourn her loss, which will be deeply felt in the various relations in which she moved.

Her last hours were full of peace, and in her we have another "witness" of the power of our holy religion to triumph over death. As earth receded, heaven opened on her enraptured vision, and she exclaimed: "Why should we start and fear to die, death is the gate to endless joy," and then added, "I do not fear to die." Afterwards when asked by her weeping husband, do you love Jesus? She replied, in holy joy, "you know I love Jesus," and shortly after, quietly passed away to the mansions Jesus had gone to prepare for her. "Farewell dear saint of God—may those who loved you here, 'press toward the mark' until they 'gain the prize,' and rejoice in the new Jerusalem, the 'city of our God.'"

WM. F. CAMP.
Vicksburg, Miss., May 20, 1867.

Died in the town of Monroe, La., May the 4th, 1867. MARY, youngest daughter of Wm. W. and Sarah C. Chapman, aged 3 years 10 months and 15 days. Little Mary has been received into the arms of Him who hath said, "Suffer the little children to come unto me and forbid them not; for of such is the kingdom of God."

A NEW AND GREAT WORK.

THE

History of the Navy

During the Rebellion.

By the Rev. CHARLES B. BOYNTON, D. D.,

Professor at the United States Naval Academy,

and Chaplain of the House of Representatives.

ILLUSTRATED, WITH NUMEROUS ENGRAVINGS.

To be complete in two elegant octavo volumes of about five hundred pages each, embellished and illustrated with some ten full-page Engravings in chromo tints, and with the same number of full-page Woodcuts, Portraits on steel of Distinguished Officers, and numerous Vignettes from Sketches made by Commander M. B.

Woolsey, U.S. Navy, and with numerous Maps and Charts from government surveys and official plans, furnished for this work exclusively.

The author has had unusual facilities for collecting original and reliable information, and has produced the only authentic work on the subject, forming a volume of sterling value and great merit, and one with which there can be no competition. It will be an invaluable work to Shipbuilders, Captains, and Yachtmen; to Officers and Seamen; and to Relatives and Friends of those who have fought our battles on river and sea.

Among the numerous illustrations are several fine large-page Drawings of the most celebrated vessels of modern time, including the Dunderberg, Minuteman, Paritah, and other iron-clads, with the ships Hartford, Kearsarge, Washburn, etc., etc.

It will be issued in the very best style on paper of excellent quality, and printed in clear, elegant type. The beautiful and costly illustrations will be engraved in the highest style of the art.

The usual bound Prospectus, containing sample pages of the work, and specimens of the bindings, with ruled paper for subscribers' names, will be ready in a few days.

SOLD BY SUBSCRIPTION ONLY.

PRICE OF THE WORK:

In Ext. Cloth, per vol. $5; Library Leather, per

vol. $6. In Half Turkey Morocco, per

ROCKBRIDGE ALUM SPRINGS.

VIRGINIA.

This favorite and delightful watering place will be open June 1st. Arrangements are making to render it more than ever attractive to all lovers of recreation, while to the invalid its refreshing medicinal waters hold out new hopes of health.

Its reputation is established as a cure for Stomach and most of the Glandular and Dyscrasias; Chronic Diarrhea and Dysentery; Dyspepsia; Bronchitis; Thrush; Affections of Kidneys and Bladder; Dropsy and Piles; all secretions of the system and broken down states of the constitution, loss of appetite and general nervous prostration, their powers and virtue as a restorative and without a known rival amongst the MINERAL WATERS of the world. They are especially indicated in the alluring peculiar to the female constitution.

Two Springs stand only 11 hours from Richmond and 12 hours from Washington by rail; in the midst of the grand mountain ridges of Virginia; in the same country with the famous "Natural Bridge," (from which it takes its name), and near to Lexington, Washington College, and the Military Institute; the home of Lee, and the tomb of Jackson.

For all ailments of the throat, dentition and prostration of the water, see Spring's pamphlet, sent free by mail.

The bottled water and the salts of this water (or "mass") can at all times be had fresh and genuine from Hegeman & Co., New York Columbia & Rogers, Baltimore, Purcell, Laid & Co., Richmond, and A. B. Ruler, Lynchburg, Va.

THE CHILD'S CORNER.

THE LITTLE SUBSTITUTE.

TRANSLATED FROM THE FRENCH.

Several years ago, when I was in a school at —, I had occasion to reprove a pupil for his inattention and disobedience. My words failing to produce an effect upon him, I was obliged to resort to punishment, and accordingly I called him up, and commanded him to stand, for a quarter of an hour, in a corner of the school-room.

As he was going there, a little boy, much younger than the guilty one, came to me, and requested that I would allow him to take the place of the lad who offended. This request astonished me a good deal; however, I was not inclined to put any question to the child, and contented myself with observing to him that, if I granted his request, he should pass the whole of the time in the corner; "and," added I, "a quarter of an hour is very long when one must spend it in punishment." These words did not shake him. I then pointed out to him the disgrace which attaches to a child who undergoes punishment, telling him that, in the eyes of all the visitors who might enter the school, he would appear a naughty and unruly child. Nothing, however, changed his purpose. He still persevered in his resolution. I then allowed him to take his companion's place in the corner.

I was deeply moved, and I silently prayed to the Lord to give me a little of that wisdom which cometh from above, in order to draw from this incident some instruction which might be profitable to the souls of the children who were confined to me.

When the quarter of an hour was expired I released the little boy, and asked him if it was his companion who had induced him to take his place.

"No, sir," he replied.

"Do you not think that he deserved to be punished?"

"O," said he, "he deserved it well."

"What, then, is the motive which has led you to bear this punishment in his place?"

"Sir, it is because I love him."

What a touching reply! The other children had listened with deep attention to this conversation. I then called the disobedient boy, and ordered him to go in his turn into the corner. At these words there was clamor of protestations. A multitude of little voices cried out at the same time. "O, sir, that would not be right; that would not be right;—nor just either," added one of the boldest.

"Why would it not be just?" replied I, thinking to disconcert the boy who had thus expressed himself. "Has not your school-fellow disobeyed?"

"Yes, sir, but you have allowed Joseph to be punished in his place; you should not then, on that account, punish him."

My prayer, thought I, was heard; and I continued in these words: "Does what has just happened recall anything to your minds?"

"Yes, sir," said several voices; it reminds us that the Lord Jesus bore the punishment of our sins."

"What name would you give to Joseph now?"

"That of a substitute."

"What is a substitute?"

"One who takes the place of another."

"What place has Jesus taken?"

"That of sinners."

"Joseph has told us that he wished to take his school-fellow's place, and be punished instead of him, because he loved him. Can you tell me why Jesus wished to die in place of sinners?"

"It was also because he loved us."

"Repeat a passage from the Bible which proves that."

"The Son of God, who loved me, and gave himself for me." Gal. ii. 20.

"You told me just now that it would not be right, or even just, to put the naughty boy in the corner, after having punished Joseph in his place—what instruction may we draw from this fact?"

"We learn from it the assurance that God can never punish any sinner who believes in Jesus Christ as his Savior." "And," added quite a little boy, "he will never do so; for the Bible tells us that 'God so loved the world that he gave his only-begotten Son,' in order that 'whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life.' John iii. 16.

We talked a long time together on the subject of the grace and love of God. We spoke of him who "was wounded for our transgressions, who was bruised for our iniquities, and by whose stripes we are healed." Isaiah liii. 5.

How condescending and how kind—
Was God's eternal Son!
Our misery touch'd his heavenly mind,
And pity brought him down.

He sank beneath man's heavy woes,
To raise him to a throne;
There's not a gift his hand bestows,
But cost him heart's groan.

This was compassion like a God,
That when the Savior knew
The price of pardon was his blood,
His pity ne'er withdrew.

Then may we in his love confide,
And know his pardoning grace;
The vilest sinner's ne'er denied,
Who truly seeks his face!

FARM AND GARDEN.

SPRING WATER AS FOOD FOR PLANTS.
The following paragraph is going the rounds, and it is time it were nailed to the counter:

It is stated by an English horticultural paper that Prof. Schultze asserts that pure pump, spring, or river water contains an inexhaustible supply of nutriment that is the real staple food for plants; and that the knowledge of this is calculated to throw light on many puzzling phenomena in vegetable physiology and culture. The art of making water nutritious should be the true aim of horticulture and agriculture.

We suspect an English horticultural paper has done Professor Schultze some injustice. If he said any such thing as is reported he must be a quack. Pure pump or spring water may contain certain minerals which enter into the structure of plants, or it may not; but it never contains ammonia of any account, and it is the nitrogen in ammonia which furnishes plants with their chief nutriment to plants until it has been well exposed to the air. Vapor, in floating about, condensing and falling in rain, becomes highly charged with ammonia gathered from the atmosphere, and hence furnishes plants with abundance of food. "The art of making water nutritious should be the true aim of horticulture and agriculture" if anybody knew how to do it; but we know of no artificial method of charging water with ammonia on a sufficiently extensive scale to amount to anything. We would rather say that the aim of horticulture and agriculture should be, the art of preparing the soil to absorb from the atmosphere and rains the life-sustaining gases, and to retain them till called for by the growing plants, and let nature take the water to her own taste. If pure water contains so much nutriment for plants, we do not see the utility of trying to make it nutritious.—Wisconsin Farmer.

A planter writes to the Monroe (La.) Telegraph, stating that the most efficacious defense against the ravages of black birds, is to roll the seed corn in coal tar before planting. He had fifty acres planted in corn, about two years ago, the crop on which was entirely destroyed by these birds. The following year he rolled his seed in coal tar and lard. He says that after the corn came up the birds and crows would pull up a stalk in the hills, but never more than one stalk in a hill. They found it not the kind of corn they were used to and concluded to let it alone. Should you conclude to try it, get some coal tar and plant a few rows or throw it around on the turn rows, and you will find they will not trouble it. I wish I had all the black birds in your parish on my place, not one should be harmed. I have made it a rule on my plantation to charge every negro one dollar for every one he kills. They are worth their weight in greenbacks. They destroy more cotton worms than any remedy that has ever been known. I have planted fifty acres in corn this year, on the first day of March, and have a splendid stand and lots of black birds.

CULTIVATING THE MUSHMELON.—A correspondent of the Country Gentleman has had several years' experience in the following way of growing melons, cucumbers, etc. "Manure is the first consideration. I use none but horse manure; having had it laid up to ferment, I turn it over several times until the strong heat has passed off. I then dig my holes twelve inches square, eight or ten inches deep. I then fill up with manure to the level of the surface of the ground. On this I put two inches of soil. I then take a four-inch flower-pot, set this in the center, then draw the remainder of the soil around the pot, pressing it rather firmly around it, until you have the soil about four inches deep; then giving your pot a twist round, withdraw it. This leaves a hole four inches deep by four wide. In this I drop five or six seeds, and cover to the depth of three quarters of an inch. Over this I place a light of six by eight glass, pressing it lightly to fit close. I then give no more attention till the plants are touching the glass. I then go through them, taking a small lump of earth or small stone, raise up one end of the glass and place this under it; this admits of a circulation of air over the plants and hardens them off. In about three days more I remove the glass entirely. By this time they will be in the rough leaf. I thin out to three plants in a hill. I draw a little fine soil around them, up as high as the seed leaf, and the work is done. The advantages of this system are, the protection of the young and tender plants from cold winds and rains, and last, though not least, it is the only effective way of protection that I have found for that arch enemy of all this class of plants, the striped yellow bug. Cucumbers, watermelons, and squashes can be raised in the same way."

lectual way of protection that I have found for that arch enemy of all this class of plants, the striped yellow bug. Cucumbers, watermelons, and squashes can be raised in the same way."

Professor Doremus, who was present, was called upon by a gentleman to give his views as to the comparative merits of common lead and tin or tin-lined pipes. The professor, in answer, referred to the common use of tin pipes in the laboratory, where chemically pure water was absolutely necessary. He also referred to and pointed out the error of a very common belief that impure water acting on lead pipe produced an insoluble salt, which formed a coating on the interior of the pipe and did not injure the water; asserting that all the salts of lead produced by the chemical action of water, whether pure or containing the foreign matter commonly found in it, were soluble.

SCIENTIFIC.

TIN-LINED LEAD PIPE.

One of the most important improvements of the day, considered from a sanitary point of view, is the substitution of tin-lined lead pipe for the common lead pipe almost universally used for so many years in the principal cities of the United States and Europe, for the introduction of water into houses. That water impregnated with salts of lead is very injurious to health, when drunk or used for culinary purposes, has long been known, but it has only been within a few years that the full extent of the injury has been realized. Water passing through unlined lead pipes is always more or less apt to corrode them and take up the poisonous salts of the metal in solution, especially when it remains in the pipes for any length of time; and much sickness has been engendered by the drinking of water thus poisoned. Several substitutes for leaden water pipes have been proposed; but owing to the mechanical greater adaptability of the lead pipe, it has not yet to any extent been displaced.

The well-known property of tin in resisting the chemical action of water, and of the salts and gases commonly contained therein, has long indicated it as a suitable material for water pipes; but the expense of pipes made wholly of tin has been an obstacle to their adoption. The lining of lead pipes with that metal was long ago suggested, but, till recently, no method was discovered by which a perfect lining could be insured, and owing to the galvanic action produced by the water where the lead and tin were separately in contact with it, the evil of corrosion was rather increased than diminished. The difficulty has now, however, been completely overcome, and lead pipe with a perfect lining of tin is made by a patented process by the Colwells, Shaw & Willard Manufacturing Company, at their works in West Twenty-seventh street, New York.

On the 23d instant we attended an exhibition of the manufacture of the tin-lined lead pipe, and tests of its strength, at the above works. The exhibition was more particularly given with a view to make the merits of this pipe known to the architects of New York and the vicinity, who were numerous represented. Several medical and scientific men were also present. The process of manufacture is very simple. A hollow cone of tin is placed in a cylindrical mold, under an hydraulic press, on a mandrel of the intended size of the bore of the pipe to be made, and a cylinder of lead is then cast around it. The ram of the press, having an attached plunger fitting to the mold, is then brought down by a pressure of between two and three tons per square inch, and the plunger forces out the tin and lead together between the mandrel and a die at the bottom of the mold in the form of pipe, the tin forming a perfect lining to the lead, though being only a tenth part of the whole weight of the pipe. A very important feature of this tin-lined pipe is that the tin, being so much stronger than lead, enables the lead pipe to be made so much lighter that pipe of a strength to stand the requisite pressure for domestic water-supply can be produced at a less cost than the common lead pipe heretofore used. Tests made in the presence of the visitors with common lead pipe of various calibers and tin-lined lead pipe of the same calibers, but of only one-half the weight, showed in every case the tin-lined pipe to have the greater strength. A calculation made by Professor Tillman, after the tests were concluded, showed the average to be one-seventh in favor of the tin-lined pipe. A coil of pipe, one hundred and sixty feet long, when cut open longitudinally, showed the tin lining to be perfect throughout.

Professor Doremus, who was present, was called upon by a gentleman to give his views as to the comparative merits of common lead and tin or tin-lined pipes. The professor, in answer, referred to the common use of tin pipes in the laboratory, where chemically pure water was absolutely necessary. He also referred to and pointed out the error of a very common belief that impure water acting on lead pipe produced an insoluble salt, which formed a coating on the interior of the pipe and did not injure the water; asserting that all the salts of lead produced by the chemical action of water, whether pure or containing the foreign matter commonly found in it, were soluble.

The question of the practicability of preserving the continuous tin lining in making soldered joints in the tin-lined pipe was then raised, and several practical plumbers present asserted that a workman of ordinary skill could without difficulty join the two joined pipes would be perfect, leaving no lead exposed.

We shall shortly publish a fuller description of the works of the Colwells, Shaw & Willard Manufacturing Company, of the magnitude of which some idea may be formed when we state that they are capable of turning out four tons of tin-lined lead pipes daily. This quantity is equivalent to eight tons of the heavier common lead pipe.—Another article manufactured at the same establishment is tin-faced sheet lead for the tinning of tanks.

HOUSEKEEPER'S DEPARTMENT.

VARIOUS RECIPES.—To make Charlotte Russe take one pint milk, three-fourths of a pound of sugar, and a half box gelatin. Put these together and set over a kettle of boiling water after the gelatin is dissolved; beat four eggs and stir in; when it looks clear, take it from the fire and cool. Beat to a stiff froth one pint of cream, and flavor with vanilla; add to the custard when cold, and beat all well together. Line a mould with cake and fill with the liquid; keep in a cool place. . . . To make Blanc Mange take one pint of milk, sweeten to taste, set over a kettle of boiling water, put in two ounces of isinglass; when dissolved, strain and cool in a mould. For an invalid, substitute a double handful of Irish moss well washed. Flavor after straining. . . . To make Johnny Cake take one pint of corn meal, half pint of wheat flour, one pint of buttermilk, three eggs, one cup of sugar, one teaspoonful of soda. Beat the eggs and sugar (white is best) well together, add soda to buttermilk and stir in quickly with flour and meal; then salt; a handful of suet chopped fine is a good addition. Bake in two sheets about twenty minutes. This is not old-fashioned, but splendid when well made. . . . To make old-fashioned short-cake take one quart flour; two teaspoons cream; half teaspoon of salt. Burn one cob and take one teaspoon of the ashes and dissolve in two tablespoons of water, strain and use the liquor thus obtained instead of soda. Roll thin. . . . To make short-cake: Take one pint sour milk; three tablespoonful of cream; one teaspoonful saleratus; roll out and put on tins. Bake in a quick oven. . . . To make pop-corn pudding, take three pints pop-corn to one pan of milk, soak three hours, then add three eggs; sweeten with sugar, and spice to suit the taste. It is equal to rice pudding.—Rural New York.

PAINT FOR BRICK HOUSE.—A correspondent of the Ohio Farmer has used a cheap and durable paint for the exterior of brick dwellings which has stood several years, and is now quite as fresh as when first applied. It consists simply of lime wash, with sulphate of zinc as a fixing ingredient. Any requisite shade is given by adding the colors used by house painters. A clear and rich cream color may be obtained by applying yellow ochre to the common new brick. A livelier and warmer shade will be added by a little Venetian red. Burnt sienna may likewise be used. The paint is far cheaper than oil paint, and costs but little more than common whitewash.

To make Cocoanut Pudding take a good-sized cocoanut, pare off the rind carefully, grate and stir into one quart of milk, flavored with one tablespoonful of rose water, and two tablespoonfuls of fine white sugar, and a couple of slices of stale bread, grated fine. Bake half an hour in a moderate oven. When nearly cool serve with cream. . . .

OUTSIDE THE PALACE.

To many persons the buildings outside the Palace are more interesting than the Palace itself. Some are a good distance off, and others near at hand, but all connected by winding walks, with each intervening spot of ground covered with grass flowers, fountains, monuments, and statuary. The most splendid of these edifices is the Imperial pavilion, which is shaped something like a flat clover-leaf, and is adorned with more rich and expensive furniture than could make five hundred peasant homes happy. There is a number of model buildings—one of them is a plan for an improved style of tenement-houses. There is a Turkish Mosque on a large scale, a Turkish school, a Pompeian museum, and a Saxon castle-house. One building is devoted to the exhibition, by work, in relief, of the topography of the district where the Suez Canal has been made. There is an Egyptian temple sixty-three feet wide and ninety-three long, surrounded by immense columns covered on all sides, from base to roof, by hieroglyphics, and standing back of an entrance guarded by an avenue of immense granite lions. The Mexican temple is one of the greatest curiosities. It is a resurrection of the temple as it existed in the time of the Montezumas. All the attendants are dressed in the Mexican costume.

The British and Foreign Bible Society have a house, in which can be seen a copy of the Bible in all the versions which they have yet printed. Besides this, they have a house where the Scriptures are gratuitously distributed in separate books in all the principal languages. The German can get Romans at one window; the Frenchman, John's Gospel at another; the Spaniard, the Psalms at another; and the Italian, Hebrews at a fourth. The Religious Tract Society of London have a house for the free distribution of its publications. One of the buildings contains a miniature Jewish tabernacle, and plans of the architecture of all the Bible lands. This is one of the best-prepared and most valuable objects to be seen at the Exposition. It would be an ornament to the best theological museum in any country. It is, in fact, a museum of itself.—*N. SPRING.

"But soft! a sultry morning breaks;
The cowslips make the brown brook gay;
A happier hour, a longer day.
Now the sun leads in the May,
Now desire of action wakes,
And the wish to roam.
The caged linnets in the spring
Hearken for the choral glow,
When his fellows on the wing
Migrate from the Southern Sea;
When trellised grapes their flowers noddle,
And the new-born tendrils twine,
The old vine dorkling in the east
Feels the bloom on the living vine.
And bursts the hoops at hint of spring:
And so, perchance, in Adam's race,
Of Eden's lower some dream-like trace
Survived the flight, and swam the flood;
And wakes the wish in youngest blood
To tread the forfeit Paradise,
And feed once more the exile's eyes;
And ever when the happy child
In May beholds the blooming wild,
And hears in heaven the bluebird sing,
'Onward,' he cries, 'your baskets bring—
In the next field is air more mild,
And o'er your hazy crest is Eden's balmy spring.'"
EMERSON.

The Make-Believe Eater of Maple Candy.

There is a moral to the following which we cut from a traveling letter in a New York Daily:

Those who go from New York to Trenton frequently, can not have missed seeing the maple-candy man. He has a more refined and insinuating of operation than his compere. He has a rosewood case, got up on a scale of unrivaled magnificence, lettered off in gilt without regard to expense, and with a very extensive area, convenient for himself, rather inconvenient for the unhappy passengers. He comes in, seats himself socially and confidently upon the arm of your chair, pokes that case of his between your newspaper and your nose, and in bland and persuasive accents begins his little talk with, "Friend, here is some maple candy!" There is a mildness, a familiarity, a conciliatory touch about the manner in which he communicates this piece of information, throwing the lid of his case up and down, and tossing the little boxes about upon it; and the way in which he proceeds to paste you with the stuff and his own presence, that is annoying, and to us, in some moods, exasperating in the last degree. But the climax is capped by the consummate art with which he makes believe to chew some of this candy. He don't chew. His chew is only put on, and put on so cleverly that none but an attentive observer would ever have detected it. The stuff is sticky when warmed in the mouth, and as the deceptive individual enters the car he gives his lower jaw two or three of those peculiar, cow-like, endwise movements, common to boys when eating "taffy." This curiously exact imitation of a person whose mouth is full of candy is repeated as he talks to you, and has the surprising effect of putting many people into the notion of eating. Hence the secret of his success.

He has discovered the weakness of mouth-watering, the contagion of appetite; and while he must unquestionably have been satiated with maple candy and unalteredly set against it years ago, when he first went into the business, yet by keeping on, pretending to chew it, he makes people's mouths water, and they buy it, and heap up a competence for him, on which, we trust, he will soon retire to a country villa, far from every railway, spend the rest of his days in peace, and leave the traveling public to do the same. How much there is of making-believe eat maple candy in this world.—West. Christian Advocate.

Read the following opinions of some of our old and well known citizens of

PRICE'S PATENT TEXAS TONIC,

Or, Vegetable Medicine.

T. K. PRICE, Esq., Vendor of "Price's Patent

Texas Tonic," or Vegetable Medicine:

Dean Sir—After a fair and deliberate use

and experiment of your Vegetable Medicine,

known as PRICE'S PATENT TEXAS TONIC,

we give it as our decided opinion, that it is the best recipe that we have ever known, for Indigestion, Torpidity of the Liver, Constipation

of the Bowels and Dyspepsia. We consider your Vegetable Medicine worthy of all commendation,

and therefore feel no hesitation in recommending its use to our friends, as well as the public at large, and that in doing so we are contributing to all the afflicted. Many of us have been suffering from these evils from ten

to fifteen years, and have been greatly benefited.

Wishing you great success in introducing this valuable medicine,

We remain yours truly,

N. O. WHOLESALE PRICES

Operations in domestic exchange have disclosed no marked alteration of any kind to-day. The market has been but barely supplied with private and commercial offerings, and the demand on the part of remitters has been much smaller than had been generally calculated upon. The actual purchases by banks and bankers comprised the summed amounts, viz : \$20,000 Mobile sight on New York at $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. premium; \$20,000 New York do. at par; \$40,000 and \$80,000 do. at $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. premium; \$15,000 and \$30,000 at 5-16 per cent. premium; and \$15,000 at $\frac{3}{8}$ per cent. premium, \$10,000 ten days' sight at $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. discount, and \$10,000 thirty days' at 1 per cent. discount. It is hardly necessary to add that no quotable variation has transpired in rates to-day, or that the following previous figures, which we repeat, can be considered as much better than nominal, viz $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. premium at bank and $\frac{3}{4}$ to $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. premium out of doors for sight checks on the Northern cities.

WENT OUT OF THE HOUSE

AND SAT BY THE SEASIDE.

The soldiers of Xenophon, as they returned from that famous retreat, the history of which has made their names immortal, coming in view of the sea, the waters of which washed the shore of their native land, ex-claimed, "The seal the seal!" How many great interests and histories cluster about the seal! It is pleasant to sit on the breezy shore; be-neath the rippling and splashing waves, and listen to their soothing and solemn sounds. The waters move with ceaseless motion, the winds and breezes are ever sport-ing with the bright and curling waves, and yet its effect upon me soothing and pensive. It is ever ebbing, edging, and flowing, yet it is as unchanging as the stars that line above it and glass themselves in its waters. Old Ocean, whether in as summer evenings be, or during in the tear of its glory, is the same. A hundred centuries roll on to eternity, and bear genera-tions, empires, philosophies, and religions away, but it is unchanged by the touch of time or the powers of art—the same that it was when the morning stars sang together and the sons of God shouted for joy; a sublime emblem of the im-mutability of Him who is without change or the shadow of turn-ing.

As I sit and look out on the roll-ing sea, whether bright with glori-ous sunlight, or sombre and solemn with the shadows of the night, I think, "Old Ocean, how many na-tions have died around thy shores! how many royal navies have been wrecked by thy resistless waves! how many cargoes have gone down to thy dark waves to be seen no more! What terrible scenes of blood, how many diabolical acts of cruelty and infernal cruelty have been enacted on thy waves! How many countless storms have gath-ered and burst in terrible wrath, rolling into hopeless ruin the frail ships in which men had ventured on thy broad expanse and fathom-less depths! What scenes of un-believable agony, when the light of hope faded from the despairing eyes; when loved ones in wild and desperate embrace clung together and perished in thy dark and gurgling waves! On thy waves what im-mortal names have been woun-ded by thy broad surface. how many have pursued the path to fame—discovery and wealth! In thy dark andathom'd cores what countless millions sleep, and shall, until the sea shall give up her dead." Many things have made the sea glorious in the eye of history, but when Jesus sat by its side and taught lessons of eternal truth, and wrought miracles of mercy em-bellished in everlasting lore, he made more illustrious still. Many have crossed the Mediterranean, charged with great interest and on dangerous missions, but never did any upon its waters so charged and commissioned as when Paul, the apostle to the Gentiles, crossed from Asia to Europe and from Achaia to Rome, to "preach to as much as in him was, that he might have some fruit among them even as also among other Gentiles."

On the ocean have sailed the ex-ploring ships of Vasco de Gama around the stormy Cape of Good Hope, and onward to the fabled wealth and tropic luxuriance of India; and Columbus westward for the shores of the New World—grand facts in history, but when we take Christ's estimate of the worth of a human soul, the mission-ary who carries the Bible, and the story of the Cross, over the "Ocean Wave" to savage shores, makes the highway of nations more illustrious still, and puts it to its noblest use.

A Caveat that Means Something.

On Easter Sunday the Rev. Bish-op Wilmer held a confirmation ser-vice in Trinity Church in this city. In the sermon preceding the admin-istration of the rite, he animadver-ted upon the practice and act of "professing religion"—said that such a thing was spoken of but once in the Bible, and that was in the case of the Pharisee who went up with the Publican to pray. Now, "to profess," is openly to avow or declare; and in professing religion, the parties doing it avow faith in Christ as their Saviour, and that they trust and feel persuaded that they are the subjects of God's gracious operations. It means this, and nothing more, among the churches where christian experience and character are required as con-ditions of admission.

It would be an insult to the in-telligence of Dr. Wilmer, to sup-pose that he is ignorant of this fact. It is not necessary to inquire as to the motives of the speaker in taking such ground, on such an occasion; we deal with the simple fact, that the head of the "Diocese of Alabama" teaches the doctrine that a "profession of religion" is not required in his church, and is unscriptural! It can not be claimed that it was to the terms, merely, that the reverend gentleman ob-jected; for his scripture instance does not contain them or their equivalent. It must be to the thing itself that he excepts—the avowal of a conscious religious experience or work of grace. I know such a position was a logical necessity, to keep in countenance the doctrine of sacramental grace, but did not think that there was candor enough publicly to avow it. This being conceded, several points may be considered as settled—as,

1. That, in submitting to the rite of confirmation in the Episcopal Church, persons do not "profess religion," i.e., they do not profess to have conscious faith in Christ, or to be the subjects of a gracious work.

2. That, by this and kindred steps, they are not expected to do so thereafter.

3. That the Bishop of the Diocese of Alabama and his clergy do not make this profession, for they do not, of course, do such an unscript-ural thing!

4. That those persons received into that communion from other churches are discouraged from ad-hering to the professions of piety they formerly made, and, of course, should be expected to abandon them as pharisaical. Query: why such anxiety to proselyte such a pharisaic set!

5. This feature in the teaching of that church goes far to explain the fact, that many who have been confirmed, and lived for years in the belief that they were the disci-ples of Christ, become awakened and converted, and then find out and declare that they never knew themselves, or the grace of God, until then. Such a scene has been witnessed, within a few days, in this Diocese.

As a prudential matter, this dis-claimer of the bishop's may be in place. The world is made to un-stand that, in what is done at con-firmation, there was no "profes-sion" of piety. If, then, within a week or two thereafter, the "con-firmed" are found acting on a jockey club, or in the "dress-circle" of the theatre, the world will per-ceive no discrepancy between the two scenes. All will be understood.

There is a point, however, that requires an explanation. Though it is pharisaic for the parties them-selves to "profess religion," another does it for them in the most explicit terms. Just before laying his hands upon the parties, the bishop spoke thus to the Lord: "Almighty and Everlasting God, who hast vouchsafed to regenerate these, thy servants, by water and the Holy Ghost, and hast given unto them forgiveness of all their sins"—how the bishop knows this does not ap-pear, for many of the parties sub-sequently declare that they knew nothing of it. If the bishop could say all this for them, and in so doing speaks the truth, why is it so very pharisaic for the parties to express their own convictions upon the subject? The case may be gently put in this form: The persons confirmed are either in a renewed and gracious state, or they are not; if they are, the rite is useless, they having been pre-viously baptized and admitted to the church; if they are not, then it is worse than useless, it is a fraud of the most solemn and objection-able character, as it officially and professedly, in the name of God, announces what is not true, to the imminent peril of souls.

The scriptural character of the rite is not under consideration. It has none.

We think the bishop eminently unfortunate in the scripture char-acter selected for illustration. The Pharisee certainly belonged to the "established Church," claimed au-thority and validity for it as the primitive and true Church, and be-lieved fully in the efficacy of rites; he pleads nothing else. The Pub-lican made demonstration on the ground of personal experience. He used no book, uttered nothing that was printed, but spoke from the promptings of the heart. Surely "the church" has misapprehended the bearings of this case.

"MEN OF ONE WORK."

MR. EDITOR: I was permitted but once to enjoy the pleasure of seeing and hearing the late, venerable Bishop Soule, and that was in the city of Montgomery, Ala., during the session of the Alabama Con-ference in 1860. During that brief period I heard the Bishop utter many opportune and valuable coun-tions, of which I have often thought since, particularly this year. Among the valuable items he gave us, was the one which forms the caption of this article. "Standing erectly—for one of his age—with a venerable solemnity, which gave tremendous weight to his remarks, in the presence of the whole Con-ference and audience, and with measured emphasis, as the fires of love flashed upon his soul and beamed in his eye, he said: "My brethren in the ministry, be men of one work." Coming, as these words did, from the man who had spent sixty-two years of his life in the min-istry of God's word—through storm and sunshine, over mountains and across plains, by land and sea, in plenty and in want, among foes and among friends—they made an indelible impression upon my mind and heart. This was the utter-ance of sanctified old age and of sound discretion, founded upon the experience of sixty-two years and the teaching of God's eternal truth. And now, whilst the remains of the venerable Bishop sleep in Jesus near Nashville, Tenn., that voice of the past still echoes upon my mem-ory, and I often think, "Men of one work!"

The remark is suggestive of two or three items of importance; and 1st. The grandeur of the work in which the ministry is engaged. There is no other work comparable with this. Others may be engaged in the works of art and science, and rise to lofty heights, and shed in-creasing light upon the intellectual man; but the minister of the Gospel is engaged in that work in which angels are pre-eminently and intensely interested—in a work that drew forth the sublimest counsels of heaven, and poured forth the richest resources of the Divine mind. What presents a grandeur that equals the self-sacrificing min-istry for the good of man? Men may engage in the enterprise of war, armies may march, nations may wonder, papers may puff, peo-ples may bleed and die, omissions may be given, men may be exalted and trumpeted through the land, bon-fires may be kindled, festivals may be given, revelry may be heard, and all for what? Because some of the human family have been manacled and scourged, cities have been burned, orphans and widows have been made, wailing is heard, sadness, dark and dreary, spreads far and wide. But the minister of the Gospel goes forth to liberate from the chains of dark-ness and sin, to secure peace and tranquility, to bind up the broken-hearted, and to lead forth the erring sons of Adam into that path that leadeth to the eternal city—to an everlasting home.

2d. The unity of the ministry that should exist, not only among those of the same church or profession, but also among ministers of all the orthodox churches. In this par-ticular "union is strength." As all are allied to the Great Head of the Church by conversion and calling, all should have a common sympathy—should bear each other's burdens and so fulfill the law of Christ. It has been a lack of unity at this point that has immensely retarded the great work of human salvation. Nothing can be more disagreeable than to see church arrayed against church, and pulpit against pulpit, when it is known that the whole affair is the result of religious bigotry, or religious fanaticism. This unity, however, will depend much upon the amount of pure re-ligion the ministry may possess. There is no feeling so impervious as that of a fallen, back-sliden re-ligionist. There is no prejudice so inveterate, blind, and deaf as that of a religious partizan.

3d. The minister should be a man distinctly and emphatically of one work. As far as it lies within the range of possibility and practicability, he should be wholly set apart to this work. It is not within his legiti-mate province to engage in any other callings than the ministry of "the word," only in so far as he can bring these to bear upon the central and all-pervading idea of singleness of purpose and simplicity in this work. With a ministry thus set apart and sustained by the Church, a life and power would be imparted to religion in this land that would send throbs and t. rills of joy to the remotest member of the mystic body of Christ; and soon the Church would come forth as mighty, as terrible as an army with banners, and soon the banners of salvation and peace would wave from the ramparts of the world, and flout in every breeze and float upon every sea, and one loud, universal Allelujah would be raised to the Lord Omnipotent.

BIOGRAPHICAL.

Rev. Bennet R. Truly died in Labine Parish, La., April 12, 1867. On the 17th of February previous his wife, Eliza H. Truly, died. Bennet R. Truly was born in Natchez, Miss., November 26, 1798. His mother died when he was five, and his father when he was thirteen, years of age. He walked from the Atchafalaya to Claiborne county, Miss., and lived with his sister, Mrs. Mc-Caleb. There, on the 24th of June, 1824, he was married to Eliza H. Ussery, a daughter of Samuel and Nancy Ussery. She was born in Lulenberg county, Va., September 13, 1805, was con-verted and joined the M. E. Church South at the age of thir-teen or fourteen years. Not long after their marriage he was con-verted and joined the same church. He was licensed to preach by a Quarterly Conference held at Pleasant Grove, in Madison county, Miss., October 17, 1835—John J. E. Byrd, Presiding Elder. He was for many years a member of the Mississippi Conference, was transferred to the Louisiana Conference in 1852, and located in Chicco county, Ark., in 1856. He moved to Labine Parish No-vember, 1859. Here he did good service as a local preacher till his death. The writer of this im-perfect sketch enjoyed but a short acquaintance with him. He is glad that it was his privilege to know him. He was impressed with his personal piety, his love for the doctrines and discipline of his church, his love for souls and his great zeal in laboring for their salvation. He was with him and heard him preach but a short time before his death. He was sad and lonely then on account of the death of that loved one who had been his help-mate so long that she seemed a part of himself. He knew she had been a devoted Christian, and that she died in the faith. Now that she had gone his heart was troubled; but there was no thought of inactivity. He seemed as if he were about to begin life anew. He spoke of receiving an appointment from the Presiding Elder; which he doubtless would have done had he lived: but the time of this de-parture was at hand. He had fought the good fight, he had fin-ished his course, he had kept the faith. He has left for his chil-dren the richest of legacies, a bright and glorious example. May they follow it, and like him die in the faith. W. H. M.

CHINA MISSION.

SHANGHAI, CHINA, March 8, 1867.

REV. E. W. SNYON—My Dear Brother: By the last mails we were favored with another letter from you, containing the second remit-tance. We are glad to hear you speak so hopefully of sustaining the Mission. My health is now much improved. Bro. Allan and myself both have work for this year, so that we can sustain our-selves, and will be able to appro-priate what comes from the Board in the paying off the Mission debt. We want to commence the next year free of debt. Bro. Allan has the Chinese school in the city, es-tablished by the Chinese govern-ment. He will give you a full account of it, no doubt. I am now acting as interpreter at the English Municipal Council, and also at the Persian Consulate as formerly. Consequently, I am kept busy the entire week, except the last of Saturday. I shall not be able to do much Missionary work while I am acting as interpreter, except on Saturday afternoon and on Sunday. I am opening a school near my house, where I intend to have preaching occasionally at night. In this way I hope to be able to do some Missionary work. Bro. Allan and myself both hope to commence our Missionary work next year free from all embarrassment, and give our whole time to the work. We have already written to one of our native preachers, Bro. Hoe, at Tien-Tsin, to come down with his family and take work at Nankin, as we wish to establish a Mission station there. We want, also, to encour-age our young men in the church to study the Scriptures, and for this purpose we want to form them into classes and instruct them. What we want is a native ministry. We want efficient native helpers in the work. We, as Missionaries, can do much if entered into in the proper spirit, but we must have a native ministry to carry the Gospel home to the hearts of their own countrymen. In your appropria-tions, we hope you will remember this item. We have four or five young men who have been some years in the church, and we should like to see them preparing them-selves for usefulness among their own people. I shall remain in China if I can keep my health. I do not wish to give up the work so dear to me, if it is possible to con-tinue in the field and have support. Though I am engaged as inter-preter, I feel it is a school in which I am being better prepared for the work of preaching. The health of my family is very good. Remem-ber us both kindly to your family. Remember us in your prayers at the throne of grace, and believe me, as ever,

Your brother in Christ,

J. W. LAMBRETH.

BRAZILIAN EMANCIPATION.

About one month ago, one of the New York papers published what purported to be a decree of the Emperor of Brazil abolishing slavery.

This was permitted to run until it was copied into nearly every paper in the whole country, and then it was corrected by the editor with whom it originated, and he modestly requested papers that had published the story to contradict it.

Those who are acquainted with the Brazilian form of Government were not imposed on by the New York fabrication, because they knew the Emperor had no au-thority to abolish slavery by a decree or otherwise. What would your readers think of a telegram announcing that Queen Victoria had just put an end to all controversy about "reform" in her dominions by a short de-cree or edict from the throne, and yet she has just as much au-thority to do so as the Emperor of Brazil has for abolishing slav-ery by proclamation or otherwise. Such edicts may be issued by the Autocrat of Russia, or by his brother at Constantinople, but not by a constitutional executive.

Slavery in Brazil is in all prob-ability temporary, and by the close of this century will pass away; but it will be by act of the Brazilian Parliament, and not by an Imperial decree. J. E. N.

New Orleans, June 12, 1867.

There are 640 charitable insti-tutions in London, England, and the contributions to their support aver-age more than five dollars a year from each inhabitant of the city, in addition to the amounts received from established endowments. No city in the world expends as much in charity, in proportion to its popu-lation, as the city of London.

Rev. Robert Moffat, the well known missionary of South Africa, has been, with his devoted wife, in that field forty years. He is now engaged in bringing out a care-fully-revised edition of the New Testa-ment in the native tongue, and readers, he says, are increasing on every side. Mr. Moffat is the father-in-law of the late lamented Dr. Livingstone.

The exhibition of pictures in Pa-ris contains two oil paintings by M. de Waldeck, an artist a hundred years old. He was born at Vienna in 1766, accompanied Lavallant on his journey to Southern Africa in 1785, served as a volunteer in the French army in Italy in 1794, accom-panied Lord Cochrane to Chile in 1819, and subsequently traveled a great deal in Africa, Guatemala and Mex-ico.

THE THEORY OF RITUALISM.

I have no apology for this little tribute to current theology, for we must feel, in our most honest and earnest moods, that though any strife has its painful phase, none is worse than that which is carried on in the dark. The strife has arisen now. It cannot be smothered or dismissed. And if this essay helps but two or three to realize what is going on in the English Church, I shall feel that I have not written it altogether without some useful end.

The general view of the "Holy Catholic Church" taken by those of whom I speak, agrees with that held by many who profess a dislike of extreme ritualism. They believe it to be a body put into spiritual union with Christ by baptism, and that the new life thus created is supported by spiritual food, conveyed to the soul through the Holy Communion. Then, seeing that baptism and the Lord's supper are the two foci round which the Church, as a body witnessing to the unseen, revolves, they proceed to shape this fact into a system which shall present it logically to the people. In pursuing this object, they reject every view which interferes with its symmetry and compactness, until at last their chief regard is bestowed upon the Holy Communion. This is the central point towards which all the lines upon which the soul travels converge, and from which supplies diverge to sustain the army of the faithful. While they lay vital stress upon the necessity of baptism, that is after all but the entrance into a community which is kept alive by the food supplied through the Holy Communion. Then, having put a lower value upon all other means of contact with God, or assigned them a position which shall assist a right reception of the Holy Communion, they bring their desires for a compact system into a focus upon this sacrament.

The ritualistic party have now reached a point at which they are compelled to give an explanation of the machinery by which reciprocal relations are established between God and man in the Holy Communion. Committed to the construction of a compact theory of worship, this top-stone must be carefully shaped. It is said that in order that the recipient may communicate with intelligence, it is necessary for him to know precisely what he is about. He is going to receive spiritual food. He is not merely the subject of religious emotion excited by the thought that he is humbly straining himself to realize his near relation to God. He is not refreshing his historical belief in the atoning death of Christ by a ceremony which recalls the last meal which Jesus took with his disciples. He is "verily and indeed" to eat the flesh and drink the blood of Christ. Professing to reject the dogma of the Romanist, which gets over all difficulty by asserting that the bread and wine, when consecrated, becomes literally and actually flesh and blood, which conveys spiritual strength, the ritualist adopts the alternative that, at the moment of consecration Christ descends into the bread and wine; that though intangible, He is really there; that, though invisible, He has come from a distance into the visible elements; that He restricts his presence to that portion of the bread and wine upon which the priest has laid his hand, and that the least crumb and drop of this contains Christ so literally, that in eating and drinking it the communicant eats His flesh and blood, which, without any more exercise of the recipient's faith than a belief that he is eating it, coupled with a fervent desire to receive the benefit conveyed, nourishes his soul as truly as bread and wine nourishes the body. It cannot be said that I have exaggerated or misrepresented the theory which he holds. The printed details in the "Directorium," which professes to instruct him in the right conduct of the ceremony, and which he has not repudiated, bear out all I have stated.

But two chief things flow from this theory of the ritualist. If Christ be there in person, within the elements of bread and wine, He may be adored as truly as if He were present in human form, upon the altar. The congregation are as near Him as the multitude were who sat upon the shore while He taught them out of the boat. The attendant priests and deacons are as near Him as the apostles were at the Last Supper.

We must allow that there is an apparent distinctiveness in this theory, which utterly pales any other conception of the Holy Communion to those who can hold it. It gives a freshness and a force to the act of communication which makes the celebration of the Eucharist more than the crown and flower of the service. It is thrilling, awful. Up to the moment of consecration, Christ is not unmindful of his people's prayers, but he is far off. But then, directly the mystic words have passed the celebrant's lips, with an unseen flash from heaven the Son of God alights upon the altar and enters the bread and wine. Who can believe this without feeling a reality in the Holy Communion, such as he never conceived before? No wonder the ritualist loves to express his sense of respect by accumulating around the altar every act of ceremonious reverence which shall distinguish the hour of communion from the other periods of divine service. No wonder that enthusiasts, who yearn for something definite, some objective, act which shall transmute christian sentiment into reality, hail this development of doctrine with delight. They had long fretted at the sense of incompleteness which marked the difference between the Church of England and that of Rome. This, they think, is now removed. They have found the keystone to their system, and lo! strength and symmetry is spread throughout the fabric. They feel that other points of difference between them and Roman Catholics are dwarfed in the common possession of a "real presence." They dream of a larger catholicism, a union between the churches. They look out over the whole Anglican fold and think, "These thousands of priests and people, though they have not yet appreciated the pearl of great price which is found in the doctrine of the 'real presence,' have it yet. Christ comes to every altar, however sad the blindness of the recipient, however dull and slovenly the priest may be."

Meanwhile, the Romanist smiles and thinks, "Poor people, you have made a great mistake. Your acts would be valid if you had a true succession in your ministers. But as it is, this celebration, of which you make so much, is no more a celebration than a battle on the stage is a real battle. You act the thing aptly, but it is a drama, not real life. Your so-called primates, with all his bishops about him, cannot do what the poorest missionary monk does when he sets up his portable altar under a tree in a heathen village. He cannot call down God. Your grandest celebration is but a magnificent sham. If you wish it to be effective, come to us for ordination."

This is bitterly felt, at times, by the ritualist. Though occasionally carried away by his consciousness of the respect he feels for much that is radically characteristic of Romanists, every now and then he has a glimpse of the enormous gulf between him and them, a gulf so serious that he would have to admit the invalidity of all his priestly acts before he could cross it. There comes the second great claim involved in his theory of divine communion. He demands that the people should accept his ordination as precisely analogous to that of the Romanist. "You are," he says, "a true branch of the one Catholic and Apostolic Church. My priestly power is equal to that of the Romanist. We differ in the definition of the process by which the flesh and blood of Christ is conveyed to the communicant, but it is virtually the same, only we give you more than he, since he denies the cup to the laity."

And in his struggle to convince the people that his spiritual pedigree is as unbroken as that of the Romanist, he forms his priestly character upon the Romanist pattern. He protests against the connection between Church and State, straining every nerve to get the settlement and custody of doctrines into ecclesiastical hands. He pleads for a closer professional training. In some instances he argues the celibacy of the clergy, and dresses as the Romanist priest. He creates as close an imitation as he can of the order of nuns. He has tried the revival of monasteries. Above all, he claims the office of individual directorship, and his ideal of a well governed parish is that the people should resort to him for confession at stated times, especially in preparation for the reception of the Holy Communion. And there is a charm in all this which gives delight and energy to large numbers of persons, especially among the young. This is heightened by the fact that the ritualist labors with extreme self-denial. No one is more constant and earnest in parochial visitation. He comforts the sick and teaches the young with tenderness and energy. He gives himself heartily to his work, and provides, so far, some of the most prominent examples of pastoral devotion to be found among the clergy of the English Church.

And his disciples catch his spirit. It would not, I think, be an over statement of the fact if I were to say that he influences and conducts a very considerable part of the missionary energy at present exhibited by the Church at home. And all this, comes, in great measure, from the fact that he has an apparently compact theory of Christian worship and service. A man who lays down the law, and gives distinct directions to those who desire to believe and do something definite, is sure to be obeyed by many. And however instinctive a dislike an Englishman has to theories, he honors practical results. He may not, e. g., quite approve of the dress of the sisters of charity, but he sees ladies willing to devote themselves to the most wearisome and repulsive work without reward, and he says, "God bless them in their toil." He looks tenderly on what he suspects to be mistakes in his theology, and gives tribute of admiration to their personal sincerity and self-denial.

The difficulties in the way of a corporate union of any Anglican Church with Rome increase the more they are looked at. Rome will not yield an inch. She demands re-ordination and re-baptism from every one who would be a priest and layman in her communion. She sets down as a delusion the whole fabric of the ritualists. They must be content to make the bitter admission that they are and have been radically in the wrong before she could approach an acceptance of their proposals to join her. Their whole past must be wiped out, and their spiritual life begun again, or rather begun for the first time. They are not even in the case of one who has lived in spiritual concubinage with another which could be set right by a marriage. The two parties have no intercourse, illicit or admitted. They are strangers. The most the Romanist could admit to the Anglican is that he has affected a forbidden distasteful identity of interests which did not exist.

Thus the very strength and confidence of the ritualistic party is at present its greatest hindrance to its junction with Rome. It is learning to depend upon itself. It feels or fancies itself in a position from which it can open proposals for reconciliation; but the very basis upon which it stands is that which Rome would require to be surrendered before it could be admitted. As a party, the ritualists could not treat with Rome. If it goes, it must go after dissolution, or in dribbles. Rome would receive ten thousand souls to-morrow, but though they go in a crowd, they must go as individuals. There can be no connection between the two churches. The Pope has his hierarchy here already. The whole land is divided into Popish dioceses and parishes. He would say, "If you join us, well; but you are only more flesh on my bones. The only body I can recognize is already in your country; I will eat you up and grow fatter thereby, but I will not make friends with you." The Pope is not in the position of a general addressed by a division of volunteers, which might be attached to his army, and yet retain a distinctive existence. He would rather reply, "You call yourself a division, and presume to say that you are willing to act in concert with me; but let me tell you that you are all virtually bound to serve under me already, and there are depots in the place you come from. If you want to join me, disband and enlist. I have skeleton regiments there which want filling up. At present you are no better than a mob of deserters, and I would punish every one of you if I could. Talk of a parcel of recalcitrants treating with me, their proper commander! Nonsense. The proposal is an insult. If you want to return to your colors, do so; but all you have to do is to return. I have nothing to say to you. Go to the depot nearest your own home; my officers there, in command will take down your names and know what to do with you. Union between the churches!—Pooh!"

REV. JOHN L. LAMBETH.

A very interesting sketch of the life and labors of this venerable servant of God, who died November 5, 1864, appears in the "Jackson Methodist," from which we extract the following item of his early ministerial history.

In 1821 he was licensed to preach the Gospel, and recommended to the Kentucky Conference for reception on trial as a traveling preacher. He did not attend the Conference which met at Lexington, but in conjunction with the late Rev. B. W. Drake, who had been the junior preacher on the circuit for 1821, kept up the appointments of the Circuit, while the older preachers went to Conference. He was received, and with Bro. Drake, transferred to the Mississippi Conference. The first intimation he had of his reception, and transfer, was from Bishop George, who reached his father's house about 10 o'clock on Thursday morning, of the first week in October, and enquired: "Is this where Rev. Wm. Lambeth lives? Being answered in the affirmative, he replied: 'Is your son John at home?' 'He is.' 'Well, I am Bishop George, and have come by to let him know that I have transferred him to the Mississippi Conference, and wish him to be ready to leave with me after dinner.'"

This was sad news to young John and the family, and especially so to his fond and loving mother, who had such tender feelings for her frail boy! "Bishop," said she, "cannot you leave my young frail boy in this Conference?" No, he is needed in Mississippi, and must go." "But, Bishop, he is so delicate he can hardly stand the long journey; and the swamps and fever will kill my boy—I shall never see him again!" "Ah, sister, his health and constitution will improve in that climate, and he will come back to see you and live to be an old man, and do good. And even if he dies, as you imagine he will, it will be better than to take an older man with a family, to that country at this time. But I have no such fears in reference to him, as you have. Come, you must arrange his clothes, as we must be going." "Then if he must go, Bishop, you will have to remain till to-morrow, that I may arrange his clothes and get him ready for the long trip. Poor boy, who will take care of his clothing then?"

To this the Bishop finally agreed. And it was a night of preparation and solemn communication with that family, for none of them expected to spend another night with John. In his own heart and mind there were deep and powerful feelings and workings. The scenes of the past day, the strong love and pleadings of his mother, the mild and sweet countenance of the Bishop, and his faith in the openings of God's Providence for the young man's life, health and usefulness, all made an impression on him that remained to the close of his life. And I doubt not but the scenes of that day and night were vivid with him, when in September, 1853 at a Missionary meeting at Pearl river camp Ground, he stood up with his serene countenance, and with emotion said: "I give my oldest son to the China Mission, and one bale of cotton toward his expenses."

Friday he bade the family farewell and started on his long and useful career as an itinerant minister of the Gospel. He and the Bishop reached Nashville Saturday afternoon, when the people were expecting the Bishop to preach on Sabbath. But during the night the Bishop had a very severe attack of sickness, and on Sabbath morning called Bro. L. to him and said: "Son, if Bro. Drake does not arrive before preaching time, you must preach to the people! Put your trust in the Lord, and He will help you." But could he preach to a people in Nashville who were expecting the Bishop to preach? While looking for a text the burden was removed from him by Bro. Drake's arrival. But poor Bro. D. had no light task. The old stone church was packed, and lot and street crowded with people to hear the Bishop. Bro. L. used to say there was one merit in the services: there was no long sermon or exhortation on that day. But the Bishop was able to preach that night, and he preached with liberty and power.

Monday morning they left for the South, on horseback, with their wardrobes and libraries in their saddlebags. The Bishop was very systematic in his traveling, riding miles, rest and cool the horses backs. At noon rest from 30 to 45 minutes, and one of the young men preach a sermon from a text given by the Bishop the day before, and hear his criticism on the sermon.

Their route led them through North Alabama, and across that mountainous country till they reached the Cahaba valley. Such were the accounts the Bishop received of the condition of that circuit, that he left Bros. Drake and Lambuth to work and build it up. It required six weeks' preaching almost every day, to get around the Circuit, with long rides between appointments, and much exposure. Owing to the neglect of their predecessor, who had left the work nascent upon about one half the year, and the inroads of the grand adversary, they had much pruning work to do, then to build up and strengthen the few that remained in the church, and rally their forces for an attack on the ranks of the enemy. But success crowned their efforts.

Facts and Freaks of Currency.

Many things have been used at different times as money—cowrie shells in Africa, wampum by the American Indians; cattle in ancient Greece.

The Carthaginians used leather as money, probably bearing some mark or stamp.

Frederick II, at the siege of Milan, issued stamped leather money. In 1360, John the Good, King of France, who was taken prisoner by the celebrated Black Prince, and sent to England until ransomed, also issued leather money, having a small silver nail in the centre.

Salt is the common money in Abyssinia; cod-fish in Iceland and Newfoundland.

"Living Money"—slaves, and oxen—passed current with the Anglo-Saxons in payment of debts.

Adam Smith says that in his day there was a village in Scotland where it was not uncommon for workmen to carry nails instead of money to the baker's shop and ale-house.

Marco Polo found, in China, money made of the bark of the mulberry tree, bearing the stamp of the sovereign, which it was death to counterfeit.

Tobacco was generally used as money in Virginia up to 1560, fifty-seven years after the foundation of that colony.

In 1641 the Legislature of Massachusetts enacted that wheat should be received in payment of all debts.

The Convention of France, during the Revolution, on the proposition of Jean-Bon Saint Andree, long discussed the propriety of adopting wheat as money, as a measure of value of all things.

Platina was coined in Russia from 1828 to 1845.

But the metals best adapted and most generally used as coin are copper, nickel, silver and gold; the first two being now used for coins of small value, to make change; the two latter, commonly designated "the precious metals," are used as measures of value and legal tenders.

On the continent of Europe, a composition of silver and copper, called billon, has long been used for small coins, which are made current at a much higher value than the metals they contain. In China, Sycee silver is the principle currency, and is merely ingot silver, of a uniform fineness, paid and received by weight. Spanish dollars also circulate there, but only after they have been assayed and stamped as a proof that they are of the standard fineness.

As Asia Minor produced gold, its earliest coinage was that metal.

Italy and Sicily possessing copper, bronze was first coined there.

Herodotus says the Lydians were the first people known to have coined gold and silver. They had gold coin at the close of the ninth century B. C.; Greece proper, only at the close of the eighth century, B. C.

Servius Tullius, King of Rome, made the pound weight of copper current money.

The Romans first coined silver 281 B. C., and gold 207 B. C.—[Moran on Money.]

BISHOP KAVANAUGH. — Bishop Kavanaugh passed through our city, and honored our sanctuary with his presence, last week. He was in perfect health after his laborious campaign in the mountain district. He was en route to Santa Clara, thence to the Stockton district, where he will fall into the hands of Elder Burchard, who, we will warrant, has work enough laid out for him. The Bishop's visits to the churches are everywhere hailed with great satisfaction, and attended with benefit to the cause of Christ. He would write for the Spectator if the brethren would give him time, but they do not.—San Francisco Spectator.

HOW THINGS ARE DONE IN ENGLAND. — A few days since the magistrates of Southam, near Leamington, convicted the organist and part of the choir of the neighboring village church of Granborough in the sum of one shilling each and costs under the following circumstances:

A member of the choir had recently died, and after his interment the organist and choir resolved to honor his memory by singing Pope's ode, "Vital spark of heavenly flame," in the church on the following Sunday. The curate told them he could not allow them to sing "Vital spark," but offered to substitute the well-known hymn, "Thy will be done." They, however, refused to sing any other piece, and told him he might give out any hymn he thought proper, they were determined to sing only that piece. Legal opinion, it is said, was taken on the point by the choir, they persisted in their resolution and on the appointed day carried it out. For this act the curate summoned them under the 23d and 24th Vic. cap. 32, for having "disturbed, vexed, and troubled" him by their proceedings. He asked the magistrate to deal leniently with them, as his object was to teach them better, and not to punish them vindictively; and each of the defendants was fined, as stated, one shilling and costs.

SIR ARCHIBALD ALISON is dead. He was the son of Archibald Alison, a Scottish Episcopal Minister, who gained literary celebrity by his "Essays on Taste." The younger Alison was born at Kelsie in Shropshire, Dec. 29, 1792; studied law, and became the author of several valuable legal and economical treatises. He is best known, however, by his History of Europe, from 1789 to 1815. The book was republished in this country, and obtained a wide circulation, in spite of its frequent faults of style and narrow prejudices. He afterward wrote a continuation, bringing the record of affairs down to near the present time. He was a thorough Tory and opponent of progress. He was knighted in 1852.

The reason why Rev. Henry Ward Beecher gave up his idea of being one of the party that visits the Holy Land in a Brooklyn steamer, is stated by a Boston paper to lie in the fact that many of the pewholders thought it would be a sort of cheat to sell the pews of Plymouth church at auction for a year, with the expectation that Mr. Beecher was to occupy it, and then have him go a touring for a solid six months. He heard of their dissatisfaction, and wisely concluded to stay at home. General Sherman, however, goes with the party, and national salutes will therefore be fired at the various points touched by the vessel.

Father Gavazzi is now engaged in evangelical labors in Venetia, Italy. A correspondent of a foreign journal says of his preaching: "His Sabbath sermons are full of Christ and him crucified, and nothing else, either personal or political; while his week-day lectures on the divinity of Christ and the necessity of a divine revelation, and the influence of Christianity on individual and national happiness, excel anything I ever read or listened to on these grand themes, for originality of thought and wonderful power of eloquence in their delivery."

ON PREACHING.—I never suffered myself to criticize it but acted on the uniform principle of endeavoring to obtain from what I heard all the edification it afforded. This is a principle I would warmly recommend to my young friends of the present day, for nothing can be more mischievous than for learners to turn teachers, and young hearers critics. I am persuaded it is often the means of drying up the waters of life in the soul; and sure I am that an exact method of weighing words and balancing doctrines which we hear, is a miserable exchange for tenderness of spirit and the dew of heaven.—J. J. Gurney

THE STORM OF HEAT.

The description of a "storm of heat" which rolls over the earth in the first days of spring, is beautifully and powerfully drawn, but it can hardly be said to long to May this year:

"Hither rolls the storm of heat;
I feel its finer billows beat;
Like a sea which ice encloses;
Heat with viewless fingers mingles,
Swells, and mingles, and matures,
Paints, and flavors, and allures,
Bird and brier inly warms,
Still enriches and transforms,
Gives the reed and lily length,
Adds to oak and oxen strength,
Boils the world in tepid lakes,
Burns the world, yet humbly makes Enveloping heat, enchanted robe,
Wraps the daisy and the globe,
Transforming what it doth enfold,
Life out of death, new out of old,
Painting fawns and leopards' spots,
Seethes the gulf-consumm'g spots,
Fires gardens with a joyful blaze
Of tulips, in the morning's rays.
The dead long loathed bursts into life,
The wheat blade whistles of the breeze,
What God is this Imperial Heat,
Earth's prime secret, sculptured life,
Doth it hear hidden in its heart
Water-line pattern of all art,
All figures, organs, hues, and graces?
Is it Dedalus? Is it Love?
Or walks in-mask almighty Power,
And drops from Power's redundant
All seeds of beauty to be born?"

As poured the flood of the ancient Spilling over mountain chains,
Bending forests as bends the sea,
Faster flowing o'er the plains—
A world-wide wave with a foam
That rims the running silver sheet,
So pours the deluge of the heat,
Board northward o'er the land,
Painting artless paradises,
Drugging herbs with Syrian spices,
Fanning secret fires which glow
In columbine and clover-blossom,
Climbing the northern zone,
Where a thousand pallid towns
Lie like cockles by the main,
Or tented armies on a plain,
The million-handed sculptor moulds
Quaintest head and blossom folds,
The million-handed painter paints
Opal hues and purple dye;
Azaleas flush the island floor,
And the tints of heaven reply."

HENRY CLAY'S CHILDREN.—The of Henry Clay, besides performing the arduous duties I have mentioned, became the mother of eleven children, six daughters and five sons. Two of her daughters died in infancy, and two others at the fourteen. The two remaining daughters lived to be married and mothers, but died early in married life, to the inexpressible grief of their parents.

But these were not all the afflictions of Mr. and Mrs. Clay. Their oldest son, in consequence of an accidental injury, lost his right arm as he was approaching maturity, and became at length so infirm that it was necessary to remove him to an asylum, where, except a few short intervals, he resided twenty years.

Mr. Clay's second son, upon training maulhood, entered into manufacture of hempen goods, fourth son, Henry Clay, Jr., graduated second in his class at Point, and fell at the battle of Buena Vista. The two youngest sons embraced the profession of law.—Ec.

The editor of the New York Evening Post, who, we believe, is a member of the Universalist Church, has a recent editorial the following: "We estimate that there have been one hundred thousand sermons preached against Romanism in this country; and that there are at one hundred thousand more preachers than there would have been for those sermons. And in there is nothing peculiar to Catholics. Minorities in religion thrive by opposition. It excites inquiry and provokes antagonism. We belong to a sect far less numerous and less powerful than Catholics; and we would have thank every preacher of the denomination if he would regularly preach one sermon per month forth against our sect. We are confident that this would double our number within the next years."

HUNGARY.—A Protestant, George Skrabap, addressed a petition to the Diet requesting the liberation of a son aged nine years, whom the Romanist clergy seized, in order to place him in a Roman Catholic orphanage. It appears that at the time of marriage, this man, who did then know the Hungarian language, had signed, without knowing the faith of the Roman Church, a reply to his petition, the Diet read that engagements contracted in such circumstances have no legal value, and referred the case to the Minister of Justice. It is said this decision has produced a keen sensation, because that certain districts mixed marriages are numerous, and the Roman Catholic clergy frequently have recourse to surprises or oppression in that the children so born are to be educated by them.

THE ELASTICITY OF TIME.

passing in this summary manner over the intermediate spaces, and may even tend to magnify the monotonous days which lie before us. Leaving out of account those tricks of hope and fear and forgetfulness which are too subtle to be reduced to any rule, let us consider what are the conditions which affect, first, our sense of duration in passing through any period; secondly, the space which it occupies in our minds; and, thirdly, the apparent distance of any point in it.

It is difficult to say by what standard the lapse of time is unconsciously reckoned—what are the beads upon our mental rosaries by which we measure its duration as it passes through our hands. They consist probably in part of physical sensations, and in some kind of mechanical tendency to the recurrence of certain states or actions at fixed periods. "There are people in whose constitutions there is so much of this mechanical regularity, that they can tell as by instinct, without consciously making any kind of calculation, what o'clock it is whenever you ask them." They are popularly said to have been born while the clock was striking, and to be naturally unpunctual people; this power seems to be a privilege as enviable as it is astonishing. It seems to be clear, from the extraordinary, almost unlimited, expansion and contraction to which, in cases of illness, the sense of duration is liable, that the more ordinary variations in the apparent length of the hours depend on a great measure upon physical causes; and, accordingly, in health, when the only disturbing causes are external, the hours which seem longest are always those which make the greatest demand upon the nervous system. Pain, suspense, and dullness are the circumstances which most certainly exhaust nervous energy and retard the movement of time; and unfamiliar circumstances tend to produce a similar effect. The first week at a strange place seems double the length of any succeeding week, and in walking or traveling through a new country, the return seems only half as long as the outward journey. Another thing which makes time pass slowly is thinking about it. The effect of directing the attention upon the rate at which time is passing, may easily be made the subject of direct experiment. In a railway journey, for instance, there is no surer way to make time pass slowly than to compare one's watch and one's Bradshaw at every station, and calculate exactly how much time must yet elapse before one can reach one's journey's end. As the proverb says, "A watched pot never boils." It is on such wearisome occasions one can by any means cheat one's self in taking no notice of the time of day, one is almost sure to be rewarded by finding it unexpectedly late when one's attention is again drawn to the subject. But the standard of comparison by which the speed of time while actually on the wing is most commonly judged, consists of wishes. We say it passes slowly when we mean that it is being spent in a manner in which, if we had our choice, less of it should be spent; it flies when we would fain prolong the particular phase through which we are passing; and this not from an insensible perversity in the nature of time, but simply because we measure it against our own ideal arrangements. Partly also perhaps it is because the mental revolt against the unpleasant phases, though not passing into an outward action, is yet sufficient to exhaust nervous energy, and so to affect the physical sense of duration.

The conditions which determine the space occupied in the mind by any given period in the past or future are less obscure. This seems to depend simply upon the amount of thought and feeling which has been compressed into, or which is excited by the anticipation of that period. There are days which have not seemed to pass slower or quicker than others, in which indeed most likely no notice has been taken of the rate at which time was passing, but which afterwards loom larger than ordinary weeks, and which we feel to be rightly entitled to as much room in our minds as any such week. Indeed it would be difficult to deny that in such days we really have lived longer than in others.

The portion of life allotted to each day is only nominally a fixed quantity, and though we habitually speak of days and years as giving the real measure of time, and of our own experience of its duration as only apparent, this is merely for the convenience of using a common standard, with which indeed nature has kindly provided us. But in this case, as in that of the dead languages, the convenience of a common medium of communication is balanced by the necessity of translation and correction, and by the inaccuracy with which it often represents the speaker's real meaning. In thinking of our own past or future we naturally drop it, and measure time by its contents, not by the number of nights by which it may have been intersected. In this sense it is no bad compliment to the most agreeable of companions to say that the time which has been spent with them seems long; the best company is that in which time flies the fastest while present, and expands the most when past. A curious instance of the reverse is afforded by sleepless nights, which pass perhaps more slowly, and yet contract afterwards into more insignificant dimensions, than any other periods of similar nominal length.

The apparent distance of any particular point of time is the result of an unconscious calculation of these two elements—namely, the rate of movement of the interval, and the space occupied in the mind by intervening events; and of their combination with a third—namely, the degree of our sympathy with our self of that date. People often say, "How long ago that seems, and yet it might have been yesterday!" Keenness of memory thus makes the past seem long in one sense and short in another; distending it with a crowd of recollections, and yet bringing the furthest point of it within easy reach. And the vividness of these recollections depends very much upon the degree in which one's point of view remains unchanged. To keep the past really fresh, one must not only remember its events clearly, but be able to enter into the feelings which they excited at the time. It is one of the penalties of frequent and violent changes of mind, that they tend to confuse if not to obliterate past experience. Nothing makes any time seem so far away as to have since then passed through great revolutions of feeling, to have adopted a different standard, especially to have lost one's hold on what then seemed real.

It is to this cause that the most sudden and violent expansions of time are due. A day in which the morning seems before night to have been left behind years ago, is a day in which some great change has been made in one's position or state of mind; probably a day in which some great loss has been sustained, which has put a deep chasm between the past and the present. People are more aged by what they lose than by what they gain, or even by what they suffer. The youngest people are not those who have gone through least, but those who have retained most. The loss of sympathy with one's own past, and therefore with that of others, is one of the special dangers of advancing years, but happily experience shows that it is by no means an inevitable accompaniment of age. A firm hold on the past is to a life almost what the root is to a tree; without it, the present, instead of growing on in its place, is cut adrift like a wandering sea-weed. Happily the natural elasticity of time is sufficient, when no links have been snapped by violent means, to bring the past very near to the oldest of us.

The Heroes of the Locomotive.

BY PRESIDENT TUTTLE, OF WABASH COLLEGE.

I confess to a high admiration of a class of men to whom a vast burden of responsibility in the matter of human life is constantly intrusted: I refer to our railroad engineers. The locomotive itself is a marvel of ingenuity and power. Compact, perfect in form and adaptation, indispensable to the wants of civilization, it is one of the finest instruments. The man who controls these thirty tons of organized iron which we call a locomotive must secure both self-respect and self-confidence. I have sometimes stood beside the track when a train has come flying along, and have observed with boundless admiration the man on whose vigilance, skill, and pluck the safety of that train so largely depended. His left hand on the lever, his right on the reversing lever—if that be its name—his body bent forward eagerly, and eye scrutinizing the track ahead, lest the tremendous momentum of his train, meeting with some obstacle, should dash itself in an instant into a horrible wreck. How, now, can a man be weighed down with such responsibility and not be a stronger and more self-reliant man?

Some years ago, with a party, it was my fortune to be on the Erie Railroad when the engineers engaged in a general strike. Fished with the engineers, believing them to be wronged. At the Susquehanna station we found a large body of engineers, more than I had ever seen together at one time. They were not noisy, nor braggart, nor tipsy; but I then said, what I now believe, that they were the finest body of operatives I ever saw. Intelligent, bold, strong, each the manager of such a wonderful machine, they found at least one ardent admirer that day.

Some of the most remarkable exhibitions of courage have been made by men of this class. A few years ago my friend Osborne, who has driven the locomotive for the mail train on the Morris & Essex Railroad for twenty years at least, with fearless faithfulness, was once delayed by snow on the track for several hours, but received explicit orders from the superintendent—not that splendid officer who has lately resigned his office on that road—"to go ahead," for the road was clear, no other train was on the track. After satisfying himself that he had not misunderstood the order, he led the summit on a steep down grade, and in rounding a sharp curve, came on a train that was ascending the same grade under full head of steam. In an instant he whistled down the brakes and reversed his engine. The noble thing, under such a tremendous strain, as if fully aware of the danger, obeyed, and threw itself back to avert the catastrophe. Meanwhile the other engineer had done the same thing with his locomotive; but it was possible only to modify the shock. Together rushed those two panting and reluctant giants, their joint weight not less than sixty tons, with the gathered momentum of their following trains. They rose like two furious animals in fight, standing on end, and in a trice the two splendid machines were a wreck. The cars behind them were also badly crushed. Osborne did not leap from his engine; but never moving his hands from the levers which controlled it, he stood as resolute as a rock—at his post until the shock came, and then, quick as thought, adjusted his valves to allow the steam to escape without an explosion. Our war can furnish no clearer proof of the finest courage than that.

At the crossing of the Morris & Essex Railway and the Orange turnpike may be seen a flagman with one leg. The other he lost in the wreck I have just described. Had he had O'Brien's nerve to face danger, he would have escaped almost unhurt. Poor fellow! the man who issued the presumptuous blunder that day tried to buy him off from prosecuting the company for the sum of one hundred dollars—an offer which poor "Bob's" wife met with this query: "Mr. , would you sell one of your legs for a hundred dollars?"

During the war an incident occurred on the Pennsylvania Central, which was related to me by an eye-witness. My informant was with a regiment of soldiers going from Pittsburg to Harrisburg in a special train. Between Johnstown and the summit they were delayed by a freight train off the track, or a part of its cars off. This they learned at one of the stations, and remained there until they should be informed that the track was clear. It was in the night, and most of the thousand men on the train were asleep, unconscious of their danger. Four heavy loaded coal-cars belonging to the train ahead had, by accident, become detached, and began the descent of the heavy grade at a speed which soon became terrible. The engineer of the special train heard the roar of the descending cars and surmised what was the matter. In an instant he ordered his engine to be detached from the train and put on steam to meet the runaway cars, if possible, to break their force and save his train. His locomotive was a large freight, and he had moved several rods ahead when the coal-cars struck him like a thunderbolt, and crushed his engine back on the train; but his heroic courage had saved many lives. His engine was utterly demolished, and many of his cars were also crushed; but so had he broken the force of the shock that no lives were lost. The man's name was Story, and his grateful beneficiaries presented him some elegant silver-plate, with the deed itself and their names engraved on them. When asked why he did not abandon his train, he replied, "Quick as lightning I thought I had better die than to have those runaway cars cut clean through my train, destroying hundreds!" It was a heroic answer.

We glorify our heroes of the battle-field and the sea; we stand all agog with amazed admiration if some foolish man or more foolish woman ascends Mt. Blanc just for the name of the feat; we talk about Alexander and Bucephalus, and Caesar in the boat in the tempest; why may not my humble pen glorify the heroes of the locomotive engine, who exhibit as noble and praiseworthy a daring as any heroes in other fields? And they do this in the constant service of the thousands of families who every hour out of the twenty-four are represented on the railways of the world. All honor to the heroes of the engine, and "ten thousand times ten thousand," if they could, would respond "Amen."

Many have been victorious in great temptations, and ruined by little ones.

Remarkable Escapes of Eminent Men.

Some years ago a young man holding a subordinate position in the East India Company's service, twice attempted to deprive himself of life, by snapping a loaded pistol at his head. Each time the pistol missed fire. A friend entering his room shortly afterward, he requested him to fire it out of the window; it then went off without any difficulty. Satisfied thus that the weapon had been duly primed and loaded, the young man sprung up, exclaiming, "I must be reserved for something great," and from that moment gave up the idea of suicide, which for some time previous had been uppermost in his thoughts. That young man afterwards became Lord Clive.

Two brothers were on one occasion walking together, when a violent storm of thunder and lightning overtook them. One was struck dead on the spot, the other was spared, else would the name of the great reformer, Martin Luther, have been unknown to mankind.

The holy St. Augustine, having to preach in a distant town, took with him a guide, who by some unaccountable means mistook the usual road and fell into a bye-path. He afterwards discovered that his enemies, having heard of his movements, had placed themselves in the proper road with the design of murdering him.

Bacon, the sculptor, when a tender boy of five years old, fell into the pit of a soap boiler, and must have perished, had not a workman, just entering the yard, observed the top of his head and delivered him.

When Oliver Cromwell was an infant, a monkey snatched him from his cradle, leaped with him through a garret window, and ran with him along the leads of the house. The utmost alarm was excited among the inmates, and various were the devices used to rescue the child from the guardianship of his newly-found protector. All were unavailing; his would-be rescuers had lost courage, and were in despair of ever seeing the baby alive again, when the monkey quietly retraced his steps and deposited its burden safely on the bed. On a subsequent occasion the waters had well nigh quenched his insatiable ambition. He fell into a deep pond, from drowning in which a clergyman named Johnson was the sole instrument of his rescue.

At the siege of Leicester, a young soldier about seventeen years of age was drawn out for sentry duty. One of his comrades was very anxious to take his place. No objection was made, and this man went. He was shot dead while on guard. The young man first drawn afterward became the author of the "Pilgrim's Progress."

Doddridge, when born, was so weakly an infant that he was believed to be dead. A nurse standing by fancied she saw some signs of vitality. Thus the feeble spark of life was saved from being extinguished, and an eminent author and consistent Christian preserved to the world.

John Wesley, when a child, was only just preserved from fire. Almost the moment after he was rescued, the roof of the house where he had been fell in. Of Philip Henry a similar instance is recorded.

John Knox, the renowned Scotch reformer, was always wont to sit at the head of the table, with his back to the window. On one particular evening, without, however, being able to account for it, he would neither himself sit in the chair nor permit any one else to occupy his place. That very night a bullet was shot in at the window purposely to kill him; it grazed the chair in which he sat, and made a hole in the foot of the candlestick on the table.

Many years have now elapsed since three subalterns might have been seen struggling in the water off St. Helena. One of them, peculiarly helpless, was fast succumbing. He was saved to live as Arthur Wellesley, Duke of Wellington.

The life of John Newton is but the history of a series of marvellous deliverances. As a youth he had agreed to accompany some friends on board of a man-of-war. He arrived too late; the boat in which his friends had gone was capsized, and all its occupants drowned. On another occasion, when tide-surveying in the port of Liverpool, some business had detained him, so that he came much later than usual, to the great surprise of those who were in the habit of observing his undeviating punctuality. He went out in the boat as heretofore to inspect a ship, which blew up before he reached her. Had he left the shore a few minutes sooner, he must have perished with the rest on board.

A wonderful revival is in progress in the Siloam Methodist church in Philadelphia, where over eight hundred in all profess conversion.

Some of the spirit dealers in London, in order to attract people to drink on Sunday, bring choirs into their places who sing the Hundredth Psalm, and religious chants.

The Gas from Oil Lamps—Importance of Ventilation.

The practice of burning common oil lamps in bed rooms is very pernicious and dangerous. The gas generated by the lamps is of a poisonous nature, and exceedingly detrimental to health, affecting the lungs very seriously. If the lamp is allowed to burn, as when in common use, the gas is nearly all consumed in the chimney, but when the wick is turned down so as to give but a dim light in the room, the gas generated is not consumed, but escapes into the room. If the windows and doors of the apartment are tightly closed, as is generally the case in winter season, the occupants cannot escape the injurious effects. A day or two ago the death of a young lady was recorded in Venago county, from the effects of inhaling the poisonous gas from an oil lamp, which she kept burning in her bed room every night. If it is necessary to keep a light burning, let the wick be kept fully up, and if there is no transom over the door, then by all means let one of the windows down an inch or more from the top. The practice of retiring to bed in a close room, with an oil lamp dimly burning, is most dangerous, and the effect upon the respiratory organs will be seriously felt, sooner or later. Delicate persons cannot continue this practice long without experiencing the most serious results. The importance of proper ventilation is not fully understood and appreciated by the masses, and much suffering is entailed upon humanity breathing a foul and poisonous atmosphere, especially in sleeping apartments.

The health of children is frequently ruined, by compelling them to sleep in ill ventilated apartments, and the fear of 'taking cold,' the great bugbear among timid parents has cost many a child its life. A fire place (grate) with a fire is a good ventilator, but nothing is equal to a window, which allows the foul and poisonous air to escape, and no room is so close that enough of fresh air cannot find its way through crack and openings about the joints of doors and windows to supply the place of the escaping vitiated atmosphere.

Some persons have stoves in their sleeping apartments; and they are almost as objectionable as lamps, unless proper ventilation is secured. The opening at the top of the window should be regulated by the degree of cold, as in sharp weather a very small aperture will be sufficient, while in mild weather the process ventilation is less active, and more space is required. Never allow the lower sash to be raised, as a cold current is thus thrown into the room, and there is danger of the occupant taking cold. The foul air rises and rests against the ceiling, gradually descending until, if not discharged, it fills the whole room. If the top of the window be lowered it rushes out, and the fresh air at once comes from all accessible points below to the relief of the sleeper.

THE BLIND BOY AND HIS BIBLE.—A little blind boy, about twelve years of age, wished to learn to read the Bible with raised letters, prepared for the use of the blind. In a very short space of time he learned to run his fingers along the page, and to read it with ease. The highest object of his wish was now to possess a complete copy of the Bible for the blind, which consists of several large volumes. His parents were unable to buy one, but his minister obtained one from a benevolent society. It was in several volumes.

Not long after the little boy received the books, his pious mother saw him retire to the room where they were kept, and she stepped softly to the door to see what he would do. And why do you think the dear little boy went alone to his room? His mother saw him kneeling by the side of these precious volumes, and lifting up his hands in prayer to return thanks to God for this blessed gift of his holy Word. He then rose from his knees, and taking up one of the volumes in his arms, hugged and kissed it and then laid it on one side proceeded to the next, and so on, till he had, in this simple but pleasing manner, signified his love for each of those blessed volumes, which through the medium of touch, had spread before his mind the wonders and the glories of God's love to man.

BABES ALWAYS.—Descanting on the immaturity of faith exhibited by certain Church members, a preacher whom we recently heard remarked:

There are some men in the Church whose lives seem mainly devoted to the nursing of others—men as large and strong, physically, as themselves, but whose moral feet can not sustain them. And what a sight to excite one's compassion it is, to see a great big Christian man forever being dandled by another! If it were not so solemn, it would be the most ludicrous of sights.—Christian Advocate.

GUYOT'S GEOGRAPHICAL SERIES—

Primary. — New York: Charles Scribner & Co., No. 654 Broadway. 1867.

The peculiar excellence of this Geography is distinctly stated by the author in a few words: "The nature of the mind is such that the acquisition of knowledge is always gradual. That gradual process has three main stages. We first take a general outside view of the object, or of the field to be studied; we then fairly go into the study of all its parts; last of all, we derive from this thorough analysis the means of rising to the knowledge of the laws and principles which regulate and pervade the whole. The first stage may be called the perceptive stage; the second the analytic; the third the synthetic. The 'primary' geography is in accordance with this theory, arranged to give the pupil a vivid conception of the distinguishing features of those regions of the globe which are large geographical types. We have examined this work, and it impresses us as being a decided advance upon the old methods of teaching geography.

TROUBLE.

A thousand eyes, and many more, will see this word, and think, "here is something for me." The mail will carry this number to many households where there is trouble of some sort. Why not then let us reason together, and talk over our sorrows?

This is a time of annoyance and vexation, and suffering to many of our readers, such as they have not seen before. Housekeepers have their peculiar trials—always have had them, but more now. There are many Marthas, careful and troubled about many things, who before this domestic revolution, knew little if any thing of them. Our planters fancied they had trials under the old system of labor, but they were nothing to what they now encounter. The grass grows not less luxuriantly in these days of freedom, and the staples need as much nursing into life as ever, but beyond a very conservative point labor cannot be urged. Getting out of the grass is a hard, if not an impracticable thing. How the grass grows this hot June weather, and how the planter writhes under what he is compelled to see and endure! Where there is much to be done there is tribulation, and need of long patience.

There are the overflowed districts where the waters have swept away the homes, fences and stock, and retired just in time to make failure almost certain. There is "cleanness of teeth" and want of bread. Financial matters are desperate, and many who would work have nothing to work with. It is starvation now, and their hands are tied from averting famine in the future. Poverty, even where real want is not as yet felt, is a heavy trial to those who have been accustomed to competent incomes and independent resources. Education and habit make many things necessary for their comfort, and the painful contrast of the past and present is the source of heaviness and continual sorrow of heart. Some are groaning under debt, with no other relief in prospect but that which bankruptcy may afford—the privilege in their old age of beginning life anew. Our cities are filled with respectable pauperism, a large amount of shabby gentility. People are trying to keep their heads above water, struggling with their misfortunes and hoping in vain for more prosperous times and better days. The weariness, the mortification, the mental and physical suffering which actually exists, outside of the ordinary sphere of charity and beggary, are not easily estimated.

These are mere surface troubles in comparison with afflictions of body and mind which some are called to suffer. A wrecked constitution and hopeless invalidism is the portion of some, perhaps, whom these lines may reach. They find themselves laid on the shelf, appointed to suffer rather than do. Nights of weariness and mouths of vanity are theirs. What would they not give for the strength and glow of vigorous health, that they might enter upon the duties which lie every where around them? There are suffering women, wives and mothers, and palsied and enfeebled husbands and fathers burdened with cares and responsibilities which they can not lift a finger to relieve.

We might dwell upon those heavier sorrows of widowhood and orphanage, and the bereavements which engloom the pathway of life. These are the mightiest griefs of all. The voice that was heard in Ramah is heard every where. Rachel weeps for her children. Not as those that have no hope do Christians sorrow, but they sorrow. When the shadow of death crosses the threshold, there is a fearful eclipse. Some joy is killed, some sunbeam is put out. A haze and film comes over the eye that once absorbed and drank in the brightness and beauties of the out-door world, and all that was glorious and attractive in life turns to ashes.

We do not doubt that the Advocate has enough of troubled people among its readers to make up a very respectable audience indeed. Some of your trials and afflictions are merely glanced at. The outline can be filled up as you read. Because we write about trouble do not imagine that there is nothing else in life, or that we think so. There is happiness in the world, there is sunshine and joy in many hearts, and there are thousands whose paths have not yet been crossed by deep affliction. Music and gladness are in the habitations of some, and very many whose harps are now upon the willows will take them down after awhile.

We would write a brief homily to troubled souls, however: Do not imagine that something new has happened under the sun. Affliction may be new to you, but not a new thing in the world. The oldest book tells us, that "man is born to trouble," and history is full of the same thing. War, rapine, oppression have been the rule rather than the exception. Such troubles as yours are have been familiar to all the generations that have gone before. Do not think that people as good as you are have hitherto escaped. The good have generally been as distinguished for their troubles as for their piety. It is a grievous wrong to ourselves, and an injustice to God, to interpret our afflictions as a punishment for our sins. Sometimes they may be so, but more frequently they are disciplinary, sent in love and mercy rather than in wrath. They are God's mint coining for us the heavenly treasures. They work together for good to them that love God.

The refuge for troubled souls is the religion of Jesus. Christ himself is as "the shadow of a great rock in a weary land." Rest is certain to all that labor and are heavy-laden if they come to Him. Blessed are ye who have fled for refuge to lay hold upon this hope set before you! The Holy Ghost is revealed as the Comforter. He ministers comfort to the soul as directly as he witnesses our adoption. How much is embraced in the inspired words, "The comfort of the Holy Ghost!" Above all, let us learn the profoundest of all spiritual lessons, the art of casting our care upon God. "Be careful for nothing, but in every thing, by prayer and supplication, with thanksgiving, let your requests be made known unto God." "For nothing," "in every thing," whatever thy sorrow, whatever thy care, bring it to God, and leave it there. "Cast thy burden upon the Lord, and he shall sustain thee."

U. S. EMPIRE.

The Louisiana registration returns up to date will be found in another column of this paper. The probabilities are that these returns will be considerably changed by the increase of white registration. So far the work of guarding the rights of freedmen has been effectually accomplished, and military registrars have held off a vast number of white citizens from taking this first step toward enfranchisement. The Republican party we suppose to be more than satisfied, it must be surprised, at the result. One could hardly have reckoned there were so many black men; they seem to have come up out of the ground. Either the census-men have heretofore done their work very loosely, or the war has been prolific of freedmen. It used to be thought that South Carolina, and perhaps Mississippi had a preponderance of black over the white population; but now it is evident that every Southern State has a large surplus of colored people. Is it not possible that the registrars have been imposed upon, that designing, unscrupulous persons—and, unfortunately, there are some such—have for their own ends produced the same individual at the several different offices for registration? We can imagine that where one is not personally acquainted with a black man it is easy to mistake him for some other black man, whom he greatly resembles—for they all look strikingly alike; especially to parties who have but recently attempted the difficult art of distinguishing one colored man from another. A change of hats, or neckties, or coats would be quite sufficient to create a doubt in the mind of the registrar, and induce him to give the applicant the benefit of the doubt. The number there are of William Johnsons, George Washingtons, and William Walkers, not to say any thing of coats, etc., is an additional cause of perplexity. Indeed, we can understand how a man who wishes to do his whole duty might be easily confused in determining who is who, by the daily presence of a cloud of dark faces meekly, patiently, and innocently looking to be recognized as United States citizens.

White applicants give far less trouble; they are known as soon as seen. But if there be any, the least doubt, the bayonets in the back room answer the purpose of Ithuriel's spear, and instantly discover the pretended patriot—

"For no falsehood can endure Touch of celestial temper."

Large numbers of white citizens have been summarily dismissed to the place whence they came. The registrars, in the true simplicity of military law, have already brought order out of political chaos. There is now but one great party, and that is the black one. Divisions, jealousies, and petty rivalries may indicate, to those unacquainted with the negro, a wholesome conflict of opinion among themselves; and many of our prominent men calculate upon a fair distribution of the freedman's vote. We are persuaded now, as before, that all such calculations are erroneous. When the time comes, the party in power will drive in the colored voters to the last man. This vote will be cast in solido. The five military districts will furnish ten Southern States to the Black Republican party at the point of the bayonet. Their twenty Senators will go into the United States Senate as the embodied expression of negroes, steel and public opinion, duly elected by and with the consent of the five Major Generals Commanding.

These ten Southern States may exercise a very conservative influence, at any rate a very decided one upon the United States Senate, sufficient, possibly, to secure absolute military control to the Black Republican party over the whole country.

By the Military Bill, the Major Generals are appointed by General Grant. So that the whole matter lies within the easy disposal of a single will. He starts the machinery; the Major Generals regulate the negro; the negro vote regulates the politics of ten States; the ten Southern States will regulate the politics of the entire government, when their twenty Senators vote as one man; and thus a million negro voters have done the work of a million bayonets. Though this country is in the hands of an Imperator, General Grant, the people, and the politicians seem to require time to realize it. That so great a revolution should have been effected without any perceptible shock was not to have been expected. The explanation, however, is to be found in the great and terrible war which has just preceded. The mass of the people are satiated with blood, and heartily tired of disturbance. They consent to any thing, every thing, for peace sake. The question of emancipation or slavery sinks into comparative insignificance beside this fact, that the constitutional government of the United States has passed away, and instead thereof, like the beast in the vision of Daniel, there emerges from the sea a U. S. Empire. The recent conflict was a resistance desperate, deadly, but unavailing against invasions of constitutional rights; and it was so declared at the time: the result now vindicates those fears which moved the minds of Southern Statesmen, and which roused the masses of the Southern people, as one man, to rally for the maintenance of the principles of '76.

We doubt if the Northern people have awakened to their own fate, at their own hands. The Military Bill which destroyed our civil existence has effectually terminated their own. It is not difficult for us, at present, to imagine the condition of the Roman Republic when it hesitated in its fall between Sylla and Marius, between Pompey and Crassus, and then yielded forever its boasted freedom to the yoke of the First Emperor, and became the principal victim of its own military prowess.

BRITISH HONDURAS.

I have just arrived from Belize, this morning, and am exceedingly pleased. In company with Mr. W. W. Scherweshon and Mr. Thos. Durr, of this city, I went to the head waters of the Belize River, and found the finest, and healthiest, and most desirable region of coffee, and sugar lands that any of us ever saw.

I have engaged a large body of these lands for a colony, with the site for a city at the head of steamboat navigation, with very great water power. I shall be in this city, the most of the time until I go with my family to settle in that beautiful country. I shall be in Dr. Keener's office very frequently, and shall be very glad to see persons interested in Honduras, and will answer all communications, containing stamps, addressed to his care.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCH.

RAWLINGSVILLE, ALA., May 28, 1867.

LEBANON CIRCUIT—MONTGOMERY CONFERENCE.

Mr. Editor: Our second quarterly meeting for this circuit has just closed, and although held under rather forbidding circumstances, was a pleasant and hope, a profitable meeting. Our Presiding Elder was prevented from being with us in consequence of sickness, a matter much regretted, as his labors would have been highly appreciated by the large congregation assembled on the occasion.

The past quarter has been one of trial to our church, as some Northern missionaries have been very pressing the claims of the old church. Even while the battle was going on, sixteen fresh recruits boldly marched into our ranks. The spiritual condition of the church is decidedly improved; the officers are at work, and all looking forward to a general revival of religion in our midst. Our people have been greatly encouraged, in consequence of the scarcity of provisions, but as the season advances the promise brightens, as the wheat crop quite promising; upon the whole we are encouraged to anticipate a brighter future.

Quite a number of subscribers could be obtained for the Advocate within the bounds of the work for the poverty of our people, every available dollar is pressed another direction. Notwithstanding these seeming difficulties, was never more confident of a final triumph of righteousness, truth, for 'tis through tribulation we are to enter the kingdom.

Your brother in Christ,
W. L. CLARK.

HARPERSVILLE, ALA., June 1, 1867.

HARPERSVILLE CIRCUIT—MONTGOMERY CONFERENCE.

Mr. Editor: The Lord's work is reviving slowly, but steadily, in us. Congregations are larger, more attentive to public worship than at the beginning of the year. The social meetings of the church are attended with more than ordinary interest, and the Sabbath-school are daily increasing in number and usefulness. At our first quarterly Conference only four converts were reported; now we have a church has been established, which makes the thirteenth on this circuit. Last Sabbath the Presbyterian organized a church near this place. Thus, you see, moral forces are multiplying.

Not long since we closed a series of meetings at Columbiana, Shelby county, which resulted in twenty conversions and twenty additions to the church. The meetings continued ten days, and were conducted by L. M. Wilson, Presiding Elder of the Jackson District. Brothers R. Phillips, W. Jones, John McGiboney, Bruce Harris, and Rev. J. Harris of the Baptist Church, rendered efficient aid in prayer and preaching. The church was refreshed by an increase of faith and spiritual joy. The rejoicings of happy Christians, mingled with the praise of converted and reclaimed persons, presented a scene of heavenly character. Such revival seasons are cheering to the hearts of Christians and people. Who can tell what sorrows are healed, what burdens are removed by them? They are like gushing waters from the hidden rock, invigorating the dusty pathway of life. O God send us more revivals!

Our church at Columbiana is one of the most prosperous churches ever saw. It has a membership more than two hundred; a congregation that can not be surprised for attention and decorum; and Sunday-school numbers over a hundred scholars, ten or fifteen intelligent and zealous teachers, is well supplied with books, papers, etc. Most of the youth of the

UNDERGRADUATE ORIOLES.

Four little mouths agape forever,
Four little throats which are never full;
Four little nestlings who discover
The way to life by a mighty pull.

Upon a limb—the lazy fellow—
Perches the father, bold and gay,
Proud of his coat of black and yellow,
Always singing throughout the day.

Close at their side the watchful mother,
Quietly sober in dress and song,
Chooses her place and asks no other,
Flying and gleaming all day long.

Four little months in time grow smaller,
Four little throats in time are filled;
Four little nestlings quite appall her,
Spreading their wings for the sun to gild.

Lazy no longer sits the father;
He is the care of the singing-school;
He must teach them to fly and gather
Spendid worms by the nearest pool.

Swinging away on the shaken branches,
Under the light of the happy sun,
Dropping through blossoms like avalanches—
Father oriole's work is done.

Four little beaks their months embolden,
Four little throats are round and strong;
Four little nestlings, fledged and golden,
Graduate in the world of song.

From Child's Paper.

Willie's Turning Point.

There does not seem to be any harm in two boys sitting and talking together, does there? Yet there sometimes is; for the Bible says we must not "walk," or "stand," or "sit," with bad folks; which means that we must avoid intimacies with them. Will, however, is sitting with Sam Jones, and Sam is a wild, "don't care" boy. I am sorry for that, since he is a sailor-boy, for sailor-boys, whose so much of the power and goodness of God on the great ocean, should fear and love God.

Sam is trying to coax Will to go to sea. He has told him about the wonderful things on the other side of the world, and ever so much to excite a boy's curiosity and interest, and Will wants to go. Besides, Sam says his father, who is a skipper, will take him; so there would be no trouble about getting a voyage, and they two would have fine times together.

"But the thing is," said Will, "mother won't let me, and Capt. Downe says I am too young to go." I cannot tell you what Sam said to that. He swore a great oath, which ought to have opened Will's eyes to the danger of having such a companion; but it did not, and every chance he had he went down to the old wharf, where he was sure to find Sam, who took him down among the vessels and up among the rigging, trying to make Will a "salt," he said.

Willie often spoke to his mother about it. "You are my all, Willie," she said, "and I cannot part with you yet." "I've got to go some time," he answered roughly. His mother was a widow and in poor health, and needed all his love and care. Willie knew this. He knew that he owed her a son's tenderest affection; but he did not think much of that while he was hankering after the sea, a forbidden object!

His mother crossed him, he said to himself, and how could he help being cross? It is true, Willie was not as pleasant at home as usual. He often answered roughly; yes, and often neglected his work. His mother was grieved and anxious. "Willie is under bad influence," she thought; and over her needle she often prayed, "Dear Lord, keep my poor boy from going astray."

One night she sat up late sewing. "Ob, mother," said Willie, "it is nothing but stitch, stitch, stitch. You will wear yourself out with your needle." "I do not mind it when Willie is by," she said, looking up and smiling. He shut up his book, and pretty soon went to bed. Nor did he kiss her as usual. "She must let me go to sea, and that would help her," he said willfully. The next morning, when the beautiful Sabbath sun waked him up, it shone on his clean clothes by the side of his bed. How fresh and nice and clean they looked; and there too was his mother's last night's work, his new trousers, which she had finished for him to wear to church.

"Mother is good," dear mother," he said, keeping his eyes on the clothes; and wherever else they looked, back they went there; and somehow or other they brought out his mother's love and mother's care in larger letters than ever before. The poor boy's heart and conscience were touched. Tears came into his eyes; not proud, angry, wilful tears, because he could not have his own way; but sweet, penitent tears, that he had ever grieved such a love as hers. "I will never, never cross her by going to sea, or even by mentioning it again," was the resolution of that morning. From that good moment Willie put a bridle on his desires. He learned to check and curb himself. Sea was given up; and having nothing pulling him

the wrong way, he was a good and happy son again.

Not long after, he went to work in a carpenter's shop. Sam Jones, however, hunted him out, and came one day into the shop to see him. "Come," said he with a bigger oath than usual, "I've got a berth for you. You must go. Run away to-night, and we'll be scudding before a northwester by morning."

"No," said Will, "my duty and my pleasure for the present are to stay at home with my mother; so there's an end of it," and it did not take long for Sam to see that there was indeed an end of it. Pretty soon he took himself off. It is not hard to get rid of bad company, after all. One must simply mean to.

Will's mother died in a year; and he said he never could thank God enough for speaking to his conscience that beautiful Sabbath morning, and keeping him at home. It was the best year of his life, and he was so happy in doing for his dear mother.

After this you will not be surprised to know that Will is now one of the first and best men in the country, will you?

FARM AND GARDEN.

CANTALOPES.—The culture of this fruit is becoming more general. But little care and expense is required to be bestowed upon it so that it may be a success. The ground should have a warm exposure and be friable—clay mold not being adapted—the hills should be dug out six inches and filled with well rotted manure and rich soil; five or six seeds should be put at equal distance about an inch in depth, and the hill should be even with the other soil. The hills should be about six feet apart each way, and the plants, when they passed all danger, should be thinned out to about three in a hill. The bed must be kept clear of all the weeds and grass, and when the vines commence running they should not be disturbed, or the rootlets connected with the vines, and by which it is largely supplied with nourishment, will be broken. The ground, as the vines begin to extend, should be gone over with an iron rake, especially after a heavy shower, to loosen it and give these rootlets a chance to take hold. They should be planted at the time of corn planting.

There are several varieties of this fruit, each having its peculiar flavor. The "butternut" is esteemed the best. The "pineapple" is also delicate. The "muskmelon" is a species that is more prolific in its yield, though, to many, not quite so palatable as the others.

TOMATOES IN ORCHARDS.—It has been discovered accidentally that the tomato plant is very effective in keeping away the borer. It has been tried with success in the East, and the vines are planted in the orchards with marked success. The beetle, which deposits her eggs during the summer months, shuns every tree near which a tomato plant is growing.

CURE FOR SLANDERING HORSES.—A correspondent of the Boston Cultivator says that this is a disease in horses. Saltpeter, a tablespoonful for a dose, he has found to cure the worst case he ever had, and has not found it necessary ever to give the fourth dose. He gives a tablespoonful in the morning, and in three days if the horse is not free from it if he repeats the dose.

FOR SCOURS IN CALVES.—A good remedy has been found. Mr. B. S. Farham, of Maine, says rennet is a sure remedy. Last Spring he had a nice calf that was badly troubled in this way, and tried several remedies recommended by friends, all of which proved ineffectual. He then tried rennet, taking a piece about as large as a thumb, soaking it in a cupful of water, and giving it to the calf. One such dose effectually checked the disorder. As this often proves a very troublesome disease among calves, it may be well for our readers to remember the above.

TO DEVELOP SEEDS RAPIDLY.—Those not provided with a hot bed, may hasten the germination of seeds sown in the garden by covering the bed with bits of boards, or old shingles. Seeds covered in this way will come up in half the time that will be required if left open, and it will besides give them a vigorous start. The reason is that the covering will prevent the escape of ammonia from the soil and keep a good supply just at the surface where the seeds are deposited, and it is, from that ammonia that the plants get nitrogen, their food. This plan is not only useful to seeds sown early, for early vegetables, but especially so when planting has been unavoidably delayed till late in the season. Remove the boards as soon as the plants appear.

WHITENING.—The season has arrived when people should begin to clean up and beautify their houses and gardens with a neat and appropriate dress, preparatory to the sickly season, as a means of preventing the approach of disease. There is nothing better as a disinfectant than lime. It is an indispensable article, and when properly prepared is one of the most valuable articles known, both as to its effect on wood and health. It prevents not only the decay of wood, but conducts greatly to the healthiness of all buildings, whether of wood or stone. Out-buildings and fences, when not painted, should be supplied once or twice every year with a good coat of whitewash, which should be prepared in the following way: Take a clean, water-tight barrel or other suitable cask, and put into it half a bushel of lime. Slake it by pouring water over it, boiling hot, and in sufficient quantity to cover it five inches deep, and stir it briskly until thoroughly slaked. When the slaking has been effected, dissolve it in water, and add two pounds of sulphate of zinc and one of common salt.

These will cause the wash to harden and prevent its cracking, which gives an unseemingly appearance to the work. If desirable, a beautiful cream color may be communicated to the above wash, by adding three pounds of yellow ochre, or a good pearl or lead color by the additional of lampblack. For a brown color, add four pounds of Turkish or American, the latter is the cheapest—one pound Indian red and one pound common lampblack. For a common stone color, add four pounds raw umber and two pounds lampblack. A very pretty pink may be made by adding Venetian red. The shade is regulated as to the amount used in the combination. This wash may be applied with a common whitewash brush, and will be found much superior, both in appearance and durability, to common whitewash.

HOUSEKEEPER'S DEPARTMENT.

OX TAIL SOUP.—Steep in cold water, for some hours, two ox tails cut into bits; put them into a saucepan with four quarts of cold water, a bunch of sweet herbs, a dessert-spoonful of whole black pepper, three onions, two carrots and one turnip; cover it closely, and when it boils skim it, and let it simmer for three hours; carefully take off all the fat; add a tablespoonful of vinegar and a half a pint of port wine. Take out the vegetables and herbs before serving.

CHICKEN PANADA.—Skin a fowl; cut it in pieces, leaving the breast whole; boil it in three pints of water till perfectly tender, pick of all the meat and pound it finely in a mortar, and mix it with the liquor it was boiled in; rub it through a sieve, and season it with salt.

SOUP FOR AN INVALID.—Cut in small pieces one pound of beef or mutton, or part of both; boil it gently in two quarts of water, take off the scum, and when reduced to a pint strain it. Season with a little salt, and take a teaspoonful at a time.

VEAL CAKE.—Boil six or eight eggs hard; cut the yolks in two, and lay some of the pieces in the pot; shake in a little chopped parsley; some slices of veal and ham, and then eggs again; shaking in after each some chopped parsley, with pepper and salt, till the pot is full. Then put in water enough to cover it, and lay on it about an ounce of butter; tie it over with a double paper and bake it about an hour. Then press it down together with a spoon, and let it stand till cold. It may be put into a small mold, and then it will turn out beautifully for a supper or side dish.

TOMATO-CATSUP.—To one gallon of skinned tomatoes and four table-spoonfuls of salt; four ditto of black pepper, ground fine; half a teaspoonful of allspice, ground fine; three table-spoonfuls of mustard; eight pods of red pepper. Simmer it slowly in sharp vinegar, in a pewter vessel three or four hours; then strain it through a wire sieve, and bottle it up. When cold, seal up the corks, and it will last for years.

FILLET OF MUTTON.—Bone a neck of mutton and lard it; roll it into shape and roast it. Serve it with a dish of spinach and sippets of fried pork and fried potatoes.

FRIED POTATOES.—Pare and cut the potatoes in thin slices over night; let them stand in cold water. In the morning shake them in a dry towel till perfectly drained. Then drop them into very hot fat, enough to float them. (The fat from beef suet is the best. Shake and turn them till brown, keeping them very hot. Dip out with a skimmer and salt them a little. If properly done they will be crisp and delicious.

HOW TO HAVE MEALY POTATOES.—It is difficult to have mealy potatoes, and harder still to get them cooked so that they may come upon the table mealy and fit to eat. At this season of the year particularly, and until the new crop comes, almost all potatoes, when boiled, are apt to be water-soaked and soggy, and we are sure the lovers of this excellent will thank us for giving them a receipt for having mealy potatoes every day in the year—not a fancy one made to order for a cook book, but one that will stand, and has stood the test of constant practice. It is very simple, and involves only a slight increase of trouble and labor over the ordinary method of cooking: Pare the raw potatoes, and let them stand an hour or so in a basin of water to which a pinch of salt has been added. Boil quickly; when done drain off the water carefully, and replace the potatoes upon the stove, in the same vessel in which they were cooked, to dry for five or ten minutes. When ready to serve, take each potato and squeeze it gently—but not enough to destroy the form—in a dry napkin, and place immediately on the table. The squeezing in the napkin takes out all the water, and leaves the potatoes that were before wet and heavy, dry, mealy and delicious.

"PECULIARS" OR GRAHAM PUFFS.—To one pint of graham flour add one pint of milk and one egg. Stir in the flour slowly, till it becomes a smooth (not thicker) batter. Use no soda nor yeast. Bake immediately. The best pans are of cast iron, with twelve sockets, which must be first heated, then greased, filled and instantly returned to the oven. If new, the pans should be first scoured with soap and sand, then greased and heated, and re-washed. Puffs may also be made without the egg, with milk and water, or all water. They may also be made of rye flour or corn meal. The corn meal requires an egg. This recipe is sufficient for twenty-four puffs. Graham flour, from which the puffs are made, is more healthy for daily use than bolted flour; because nearly all the hull or bran is separated from the latter. Bolted flour is deprived of the silica, or silex contained in the bran, and which is given by the Almighty for the support and nourishment of our bones and teeth. Hence Americans are troubled with decayed teeth, and often with their total loss, more than Europeans; because the former universally eat such finely bolted flour, whether of wheat or rye.

DELICIOUS BREAKFAST CAKE.—One quart of sweet milk, two eggs, a small teaspoonful of salt, and one pint of sifted corn meal. No more nor less. Bake forty minutes in a quick oven. It will take an hour if baked in a slow oven.

The Chemist in the Laundry—Washing.

Washing has for its objects not only the removal from our clothing of accidental dirt, but also to carry away certain ammoniacal salts, the products of respiration, which are absorbed from the body by all the clothes that we wear, especially those nearest to the skin. A change of under garments is essential to health on this very account, and the art of washing is more useful in removing the hardened perspiration from the cloths (to which it clings most pertinaciously, like the matter of contagion,) than in removing the superfluous dirt which merely offends the eye. Until recently, the laundress's first operation was to prepare "a lye" of potash, which she did by putting wood ashes into a tub having a perforated bottom. The tub was then filled with water, which, trickling through, dissolved in its course the potash contained in the wood ashes. This process is still extant in some parts of the country, especially where wood is used for fuel.

The starting process of washing now is to prepare a lye of soda. Hard water requires more soda than soft; and when rain water can be procured, alkali may be dispensed with entirely. The utility of soda or of potash in washing arises from the powers these alkalies possess of uniting with grease of all kinds, forming a soap; and to disunite the ammonia of the perspiration from the clothes, thus purifying the fabric and rendering it capable of the like absorption when again worn out. This important action has hitherto been unnoticed. Now, although we admit great utility, we particularly caution all parties not to use too much of these powerful alkalies, because cotton fabrics are partially dissolved by a strong, hot soda, potash, or lime lye. It is to this cause that the "bad color" may be attributed, which the house wife now and then justly complains of in the linen. When the outer coatings of the filament of the fabric are thus acted upon, they are quickly influenced by the air, and become of a yellow tint.

There is another cause of "bad color" and that is an insufficient supply of water, or washing too many things in the same liquor. This gives rather a gray tint. The yellow color is, however, the great thing to guard against, as this partakes of a permanent evil; and we mention it in particular, because there are strong washing fluids sold containing lime and soda. In nine laundries out of ten too much soda is already used; we need not, therefore, desire to increase the evil.

Many laundresses, when they hear complaints of the color of the articles they send home, will make their alkaline lye a little stronger next washing day, and thus unwittingly increase the evil. A judicious use of soda or pearl-ash is highly beneficial and a saving of labor; but, if in excess, is very injurious.

The strong lye recently recommended for washing linen, has long been known to those who require to cleanse linens from impurities on the surface, only. Printers, for instance, may use it with safety to clean the face of their types from the unctuous ink used in printing, because the lye is not strong enough to affect the metal. The very low priced soaps are by no means the cheapest in use; and they also impart a very unpleasant odor to the linen, which cannot be got rid of.

1st. Avoid going out after the dew has fallen.

2d. If compelled to go out after night fall, or in the early morning, do not go fasting, but at least take some slightly exciting drink, such as coffee or tea—in place of spirits—the reaction from the effects of the latter favoring the absorption of the poison.

The use of "blue" in rinse water is too well known to need comment further than to our purpose. The ordinary blue is a compound of Prussian blue and starch. The color that it gives merely covers the yellow tint on the goods without doing more. We could suggest the use of pure indigo instead of common blue. This advice is founded upon practice as well as theory. Indigo, in this operation, is without any bad action on the fabric. Persons employed in the "indigo department" of the docks have the whitest linen of all people in London.—Scientific American.

IMPORTANCE OF BULK IN FEED.—Although the presence of a sufficient quantity of nutritive matters in the feed is naturally the most fundamental matter for consideration, its bulk is scarcely less important. The function of digestion requires that the feed shall properly fill the stomach, and however large the supply of nutritive matters may be, their effect is improperly brought about if the feed be too small in bulk; and it actually becomes more valuable if diluted with woody fibre, or some other inert substance. On the other hand, if feed be too bulky, the sense of repletion causes the animal to cease eating long before it has obtained a sufficient supply of nutritive matter. It is most necessary, therefore, to study the bulk of the feed, and to consider how to mix the different substances in such a manner as to adjust the proportions of nutritive matter to their bulk. If we examine the nature of the mixed feeds most in vogue among feeders, it will most generally be found that very bulky feed is combined with another of opposite properties. Hence turnips, the most bulky of all kinds of feed, are used along with oil-cake or bone meal; and if, from any circumstance, it becomes necessary to replace a large amount of turnips by the latter substance, the deficient bulk must be replaced by hay or straw.—Prof. Anderson.

SOOT.—Twelve quarts of soot in a hoghead of water will make a powerful liquid manure, which will improve the growth of flowers, garden vegetables, or root crops. In either a liquid or solid state it makes an excellent top-dressing for grass or cereal crops.—Practical Farmer.

The Nashville Advocate states that the following rules having been left by Bishop Soule to his senior successor, were, at the late Episcopal meeting of the Bishops of the M. E. Church, South, placed in the hands of Bishop Andrew: "The official seal of Bishop Ashury—a cornelian, set in a small gilt frame, with a medallion head of Wesley. The official seal of Bishop McKendree: this is larger than common, metallic, with the initials 'W. M. K.' Motto, 'Preach the Word.' The first official seal of Bishop Soule: this is small, oval-shaped, metallic. Device, a dove, with olive branch in its mouth, and standing on a globe. Motto, 'Peace on earth.'"

Protestantism is strengthening and extending itself in Portugal. The present rising is favorable to religious toleration, and Protestant missionary societies are therefore improving the opportunity of gaining a firm footing. The British and Foreign Bible Society are informed of an increasing readiness to buy the sacred books of the society's colporteurs, regardless of the displeasure of the priests. Both in Lisbon and Oporto, English men and women are laboring in a quiet way, and are meeting with their reward in gaining souls to the cause of Protestant truth and freedom.

The Bishop of London has shut up a church in his diocese, in which there has been for some time past, an elaborate ritual. This church is St. Mary's, Kilburn, and until recently, the services were of the ordinary description.

NEW ORLEANS MARKETS.

From the N. O. Price Current.

The general market has exhibited even movement during the past three days, but we noticed in our last issue, our leading staple, in particular, has declined 1/16 per lb from last Wednesday's quotations, and has, moreover, been extremely dull; buyers being unwilling to go on unless at concessions to which factors would not agree, while the supply offering has been restricted by the new regulations of the Collector of the Internal Revenue. We are gratified, however, to learn that in consideration of the great inconvenience suffered by factors, that officer has modified the obnoxious order by providing for the shipment of Cotton, the permits of which have been mislaid or lost, on an affidavit by the taker having been duly paid.

COTTON.—We left the market, at the time of our last report, so unsettled and depressed, that we were compelled to omit our regular quotations, since which, under a combination of unfavorable causes the demand has continued extremely limited and the prices actually paid show a decided falling off from last week's currency. On Saturday, the controlling influence was the restriction on the movement from the new Regulation of the Collector of the Internal Revenue, noticed in our last issue, and only 600 bales changed hands. On Monday, although some relief was furnished by a modification of the above favorable to the shipper, yet the accounts from New York and Liverpool were calculated to prevent any business, and the sales were again of limited extent, embracing only 850 bales. Yesterday with discouraging accounts from New York and Liverpool and a wide difference between the views of factors and buyers, the former contending for prices materially above the limits of the latter, the business was confined to 950 bales at prices indicating a decline of 1/16 per lb from last Wednesday's figures.

This makes an aggregate for the past three days of 2400 bales, taken partly for the North, but mostly for foreign export.

The receipts proper since Friday evening comprise 1350 bales, against 2412 during the corresponding period last week, showing an increase of 1062 bales.

The receipts at this port, since the 1st of September, (exclusive of the arrivals from Mobile, Florida and Texas,) are 697,371 bales, against 652,980 bales to same date last year, and the decrease in the receipts at all the ports, up to the latest dates, as compared with last year, is 139,109 bales. In the exports from the United States to foreign countries, as compared with the same dates last year, there is a decrease of 61,261 bales to Great Britain, of 29,805 to France, and an increase of 37,131 bales to other foreign ports.

Monetary.

We have no material change to notice in the Money Market proper since our last report, but the general movement has been on a very limited scale, and few transactions have transpired of any magnitude. Occasional negotiations are effected of mortgage paper at from 9 to 12 per cent per annum, the lender requiring improved city property and satisfactory signatures, and loans on call, secured by approved collaterals, have been made to an inconceivable amount at irregular rates. Mr. Jacob Barker has been forced by his creditors into the U. S. Bankrupt Court, which is the first case here under the Bankrupt Act. We refer to our preliminary remarks for some comments on the exhibit by the receiver of the First National Bank.

Some incidents, unexpectedly to ourselves, make a deep and permanent lodgment in our memories.

Each has been the effect of the following incident on my mind:

In the year 1862, while the Confederacy was making a gigantic struggle to maintain the doctrine of States' rights, as against the centralization of Federal power, business called me to Jacksonville, Miss.

While there I had occasion to pass the cemetery, not knowing that any one was to be buried there that day.

As I came to the shade of the grove of young oaks that shade that quiet, resting place of the weary, I discovered a company of cavalry; they were counting one of their number to the grave—forever beyond the din of battle and the hiss of the blood-engorged balls.

Who he was, or whence he came, I knew not. He was a young soldier, whose battle wounds or camp hardships had cut down in the bloom of his manly life.

Fired by patriotic ardor, inspired by martial ambition, he volunteered in the army of the Confederacy; but early in the dread strife he laid his armor by, and heard the shouts of the captains and the blasts of trumpets no more.

He paused to witness the last salute to the valiant dead. The bugle was filled, the little mound was heaped, and the order to march was given. Then slowly, one by one, they filed through the gate; but the bugle remained last of all, and continued to play as they slowly moved out and marched for their graves.

He played "Good-bye, good-bye—that good old word."

"Good-bye!" Slowly, sadly, and kindly, the plaintive notes seemed to pour from the bugle, instinct with kindness, sensibility, and sorrow.

Alone under the green oaks, and the fair sky of May, they left him in his lowly bed—mother, father, and father all far away—companions in arms do for him the offices of humanity, and slowly moved from the place, saying to him that they are to see no more of the flesh—"Good-bye, good-bye."

Oh, thought I, how unutterably sad if it were all of life to live, and of death to die; but there is a trumpet above, and there is a trumpet below, and notes shall not say: "Good-bye, good-bye," but "awake! God calls his banished ones; their immortal spirits live, and their friendship eternal reign, and they learn war no more."

W.

By six works of mercy Christ wrought miracles upon the body, and by these six also doth He work miracles upon the soul. Blindness, ignorance and error; Lameness, infirmity and waywardness of the will; Leprosy is consecution of the flesh; Deafness is obduration of the heart; the Separation of grace from the soul is death; Poverty is a defect, or want, of the knowledge of God, the power to receive the gospel.

CHRISTIANITY should not be judged by the worst, but by its best specimens, for even in the best it has much to contend with; and if the world is so bad with Christianity, what would it be without it? Let the darkness and pollution of heathenism answer.

BRITISH HONDURAS.

BELIZE, BRITISH HONDURAS, June 7, 1867.

MR. EDITOR: We arrived here on the 1st day of June, and Bro. Avery having rented a commodious house, invited me to unite with him, which I have done. We pay twenty dollars per month rent, six dollars for a cook, and six dollars for a washerwoman. Daily marketing for eleven grown persons and five children amounts to one hundred and seventy-five dollars—for fresh fish, pork, beef, bread, plantains, etc.

I have been hard at work ever since I arrived to negotiate for lands. I have a cotton proposition before Mr. Toledo, which Mr. Harrison can show you. We feel very confident of succeeding in making some favorable terms with Mr. Toledo for all of his lands. The Governor has reduced the price of crown lands to two dollars and a half per acre, on the same time and condition as published in my letter, which his Excellency assured me he will send up to the Home Government. We find things even more favorable than before. Mahogany has ceased to be profitable, and private land owners now admit it, and hence their more than willingness to open their lands for sale and settlement. Mr. Toledo said to us that "if this present year's mahogany operation didn't bring them out in debt, they would be quite satisfied." The Home Government has already on hand three year's cutting, besides this incoming cutting.

We found so many Southern people here to look at the country, and we met with such cordial welcome from the citizens, that we feel very much at home. The Governor honored Mr. Putnam and me with an invitation to special dining at seven last evening. We found his gracious lady and daughters very agreeable, indeed. As I was placed by the master of ceremonies, at her ladyship's left hand, I had a good opportunity, in conversation with her, to learn something of her sentiments, which she freely expressed, in the kindest terms, for the Confederate people.

Monday I expect to go out with fifteen or twenty gentlemen to examine the country, with the aim of a locality to settle.

Mr. Chapman requests me to say to you that he stated the price of labor as he had been incorrectly informed; that he is, at this time, hiring hands at seven, eight, and nine dollars a month. He says he had no idea of his letters being published.

Hope has not recovered yet—balaucos are well.

THE COFFEE LANDS ON THE BELIZE RIVER.

To the Editor of the N. O. Crescent: Having just returned from a trip up the Belize river, during which we carefully explored the two branches of the river nearly to the boundary line, and having gained much information from intelligent persons familiar with the country, we have concluded to write a statement of our observations, to be published in the United States for the benefit of our countrymen of the South.

We ascended the Belize river in a small, flat-bottomed dug-out, called a pitpan, propelled by paddles, and in shoal places by poles, and found the river to be of good size for steamboat navigation for about half the year, without any improvement, and capable of being made available, at small expense of blasting and removing rocks, for very nearly the whole year. We found that the headwaters of the river could only come from the great mountains of Guatemala, nearly two hundred miles from the boundary line of British Honduras, and consequently that it drains a territory of about 20,000 square miles, and that steamboat navigation to the forks of the river, near the boundary, would take the trade of Belize four days' journey towards Guatemala, and thus greatly facilitate the trade now going, mostly on the backs of men, a distance of nearly two hundred miles, and requiring eighteen or twenty days for the round trip.

After passing through a mangrove swamp on leaving Belize, we came to low lands, subject to overflow in ordinary freshets, and then to high banks, liable to overflow in unusual freshets that occur in every seven or eight years, called topgal lands, and, about ninety miles above Belize, to Mount Pleasant Creek, where we found a high and exceedingly rich country, a part of it very good coffee lands—all of it suited to sugar, rice, and corn. It is covered with original growth, such as mahogany, ironwood, and five or six other kinds of exceedingly hard, valuable wood, of large size, and some soft kinds of wood, and the cañon palm, and a great deal of undergrowth, which, when cut down and dried for a few weeks, can be burned up in a few hours so clean as to leave but a portion of the largest trees, and then not the least work is required for the first crop of corn, or rice, except to make little holes with a stick, and deposit the seed, and in three or four months the crop is ready for gathering.

Above this place the lands improve up to the boundary line, being all a rich dark-colored limestone soil, on mountains, hills, and valleys, to the depth, as we saw, in a newly dug grave, of about four feet; and the elods from the bottom of the grave were very moist, though it was on the river bank, about sixty feet high, and it had not rained for four months.

The sugar cane was very large and fine, and the crown surveyor told us that he knew a cane field, now producing well, that according to reliable testimony, had been in constant bearing for sixty years. The whole land, even to the tops of the mountains, which are all nearly flat table lands, produces excellent cane, coffee, rice, cotton, corn, and tobacco; besides all tropical fruits and vegetables, in great abundance and perfection. We saw samples of very fine cotton, and were assured by the people that no worm or insect disturbs it, and the cacao, of which chocolate is made, grows wild in all the woods, and can be made one of the most profitable crops of the country.

We saw coffee trees planted in August, 1865, now about eleven feet high, and full of berries, and the people tell us that the whole country produces excellent coffee. Two crops of rice and three crops of corn can be raised, each year, from the same land.

After four months of dry weather, that magnificent country shows but little want of rain. The grass is green and the cattle are fat, and so moist is the earth kept by its superior foundations, that the pasture lands there are not cracked, though lower down the river the cracks are so great that it is dangerous to ride over them.

The water in the springs and streams is very good, though not cool, and though we say no wells, we were told that an abundant supply of good water can be had by digging for it. Every thing we saw and heard led us to believe that the country must be a healthy one, as the elevation of the land above the sea is from 500 to 3000 feet, and the trade wind is blowing almost every day from 9 o'clock A. M. to 6 P. M., with a most refreshing and purifying effect.

During the hottest day of our trip, which was in the very hottest part of the year, the thermometer stood at 5 A. M. 72 deg., at midday 96 deg., and at 9 P. M. 76 deg.

Very few insects or reptiles disturb this region, and we never had need to use our mosquito bars. We made diligent inquiry about the prospect of employing laborers for sugar and coffee plantations, and more than forty different persons, Creole Africans, natives of Guatemala and Mexico, merchants and laborers, unanimously assured us that plenty of good farms hands can be had to settle on these lands and work for the year, at about $8 a month and rations, which are worth there about $2 a month, and a part of the money can be retained till the contract shall be fulfilled, as it very generally is, owing to the stringency of the laws of both British Honduras and Guatemala. We were also assured that we could get boys and girls apprenticed to us till of age, and several were offered us, on condition of our educating them, some, and giving them some $50 or $100 when the apprenticeship shall be faithfully completed.

A city, to be called Richmond, is determined on at a place near the forks of the river, about one hundred and fifty miles from Belize, where there is greater water power for mills and factories, and at the head of steam navigation; and the country around it which has been obtained for a colony, will be called Confederate county.

As soon as a steamboat shall be ready, many cheap houses will be built on the city lots, to accommodate immigrants till they can select their homes.

B. B. DUVAL,
Wm. W. SCHUMERHORN,
THOS. DUBB.
Belize, June 5, 1867.

A FURTHER STATEMENT.

More than 120,000 acres of the lands above described have been obtained by me for settlement, and are held by me, by documents from the colonial authorities, and Col. W. T. Meekling, a graduate of West Point and of the Confederate army, is now preparing to lay off the city, and survey the lands for the settlement of those who may make their homes in that country.

Persons who may wish to settle on these lands, to raise coffee, cotton, cacao, sugar, rice, or corn, either of which articles, at the present rate of production and sale, in British Honduras, will produce more than one hundred dollars an acre, per annum, can get, at very cheap rates, and on credit, if desirable, as much land as they may need, if they shall get there, ready for settling, before next February.

I think that some carpenters, stone-masons, tanners, shoemakers, and some trading men, who would buy up things in Guatemala and sell them in Belize, could do well, and all such will have all the help I can give them.

A sawmill will be needed, and may be very profitable, and the water power can be had in super abundance.

I expect to spend the most of my time in New Orleans until I go on with my family to Honduras, and I shall be glad to see in the office of Rev. Dr. Keener, 112 Camp street, any persons who are interested in that country, and those who will write to me to Dr. Keener's care, and who will inclose stamps, will be promptly answered.

B. B. DUVAL.

GLACIERS.

A glacier is in effect but a flowing stream of frozen water; and the river systems of the Temperate and Equatorial Zones become the glacier systems of the Arctic and Antarctic.

We have now seen that a part of the snow which falls upon the mountains is converted into ice, and this ice, strange though it seems, is movable. By what exact principle of movement has not yet been decided to the mutual satisfaction of the learned, but it is nevertheless true. Rendu truly remarks:—

"There is a multitude of facts which would seem to necessitate the belief that the substance of glaciers enjoys a kind of ductility, which permits it to mould itself to the locality which it occupies, to grow thin, to swell and to narrow itself like a soft paste."

And this, true of the Alpine passes, is true also of the Greenland valleys. A great frozen flood is pouring down the east and west slopes of the Greenland continent; and, as in the Alps, what is gained in height by one year's freezing is lost by the downward flow of the mobile mass.

And this movement is not embarrassed by any obstacle. The lower chains of hills do not arrest it, for it moulds itself to their form, sweeps through every opening between them, or overtops them. Valleys do not interfere with its onward march, for the frozen stream enters them, and levels them with the highest hills. It heeds not the precipice, for it leaps over it into the plain below—a giant, frozen waterfall. Winter and summer are to it alike the same. It moves ever forward in its irresistible career—a vast frozen tide swelling to the ocean. It pours through every outlet of the coast ranges, down every ravine, and valley, overriding every impediment, grinding and crushing over the rocks; and at length it comes up to the sea. But here it does not stop. Pushing back the water, it makes its own coast line; and, moving still onward, accommodating itself to every inequality of the bed of the sea, as it had before done to the surface of the land, filling up the wide bay or fiord, expanding where it expands, narrowing where it narrows, swallowing up the islands in its slow and steady course, it finally reaches many miles beyond the original shore-line.

And now it has attained the climax of its progress.

When, long ages ago, after pouring over the sloping land, it finally reached the coast and looked down the bay which it was ultimately to fill up, its face was many hundreds of feet high. Gradually it sank below the line of waters as it moved outward, and finally its front has almost disappeared.

In a former chapter I have mentioned that a block of fresh-water ice floating in sea water rises above the surface to the extent of one eighth of its weight and bulk, while seven eighths of it are below the surface. The cause of this is too well known to need more than a passing explanation. Every school-boy is aware that water, in the act of freezing, expands, and that in the crystal condition fresh water occupies about one tenth more space than when in a fluid state; and hence, when ice floats in the fresh water from which it was formed, one tenth of it is exposed above, while the remaining nine tenths are beneath the surface. When this same fresh-water ice (which it will be remembered is the composition of the glacier) is thrown into the sea, the proportion of that above to that below being changed from one and nine to one and seven, is due to the greater density of the sea-water, caused by the salt which it holds in solution.

Now it will be obvious that, as the glacier continues to press further and further into the sea, the natural equilibrium of the ice must ultimately become disturbed,—that is, the end of the glacier is forced further down into the water than it would be were it free from restraint, and at liberty to float according to the properties acquired by congelation. The moment that more than seven eighths of its front are below the water line, the glacier will, like an apple pressed down by the hand in a pail of water, have a tendency to rise, until it assumes its natural equilibrium. Now it will be remembered that the glacier is a long stream of ice, many miles in extent, and, although the end may have this tendency to rise, yet it is, for a time, held down firmly by the continuity of the whole mass. At length, however, as the end of the glacier buries itself more and more in the water, the tendency to rise becomes stronger and stronger, and finally the force thus generated is sufficient to break off a fragment, which, once free, is buoyed up to the level that is natural to it. This fragment may be a solid cube half a mile through, or even of much greater dimensions. The disruption is attended with a great disturbance of the waters, and with violent sounds which may be heard for many miles; but, floating now free in the water, the oscillations which the sudden change imparted to it gradually subside; and, after acquiring its natural equilibrium, the crystal mass drifts slowly out to sea with the current, and is called an ICEBERG.

And thus the glacier has fulfilled its part in the great law of Circulation and change.

The dew-drop, distilled upon the tropic palm-leaf, falling to the earth, has reappeared in the gurgling spring of the primeval forest, has flown with the rivulet to the river, and with the river to the ocean; has then vanished into the air, and, wafted northward by the unseen wind, has fallen as a downy snow-flake upon the lofty mountain, where, penetrated by a solar ray, it has become again a little globe of water, and the chilly wind, following the sun, has converted this globe into a crystal; and the crystal takes up its wandering course again, seeking the ocean.

It was formerly supposed that the icebergs were discharged by the force of gravity, but this error, as well as the true theory of berg discharge, was pointed out by Dr. H. Kink, now Royal Inspector of South Greenland. Some fragments are, however, detached from the face of the glacier and fall into the water, but these are always necessarily of comparatively small dimensions, and can scarcely be called bergs.

But where its movement was once rapid, it is now slow; where it then flowed with the river miles in an hour, it will now flow with the glacier not more in centuries; and where it once entered calmly into the sea, it will now join the world of waters in the midst of a violent convulsion.

We have thus seen that the iceberg is the discharge of the Arctic river, that the Arctic river is the glacier, and that the glacier is the accumulation of the frozen vapors of the air. We have watched this river, moving on in its slow and steady course from the distant hills, until at length it has reached the sea; and we have seen the sea, tear from the slothful stream a monstrous fragment, and take back to itself its own again. Freed from the shackles which it has borne in silence through unnumbered centuries, this new-born child of the ocean rushes with a wild bound into the arms of the parent water, where it is caressed by the surf and nursed into life again; and the crystal drops receive their long-lost freedom, and fly away on the laughing waves to catch once more the sunbeam, and to run again their course through the long cycles of the ages.

And this iceberg has more significance than the great flood which the glacier's southern sister, the broad Amazon, pours into the ocean from the slopes of the Andes and the mountains of Brazil. Solemn, stately, and erect, in temper and in calm, it rides the deep. The restless waves resound through its broken archways and thunder against its adamant walls. Clouds, impenetrable as those which shielded the graceful form of Arethusa, clothe it in the morning; under the bright blaze of the noonday sun it is armored in glistering silver; it robes itself in the gorgeous colors of evening; and in the silent night the heavenly orbs are mirrored in its glassy surface. Drifting snows whirl over it in the winter, and the sea-gulls swarm round it in the summer. The last rays of departing day linger upon its lofty spires, and when the long darkness is past it catches the first gleam of returning light, and its gilded dome heralds the coming morn. The elements combine to render tribute to its matchless beauty. Its loud voice is wafted to the shore, and the earth rolls it from crag to crag among the echoing hills. The sun steals through the veil of radiant fountains which flutter over it in the summer winds, and the rainbow on its pallid cheek betrays the warm kiss. The air crowns it with wreaths of soft vapor, and the waters around it take the hues of the emerald and the sapphire. In fulfillment of its destiny it moves steadily onward in its blue pathway, through the varying seasons and under the changeable skies. Slowly, as in ages long gone by it arose from the broad waters, so does it sink back into them. It is indeed a noble symbol of the Law—a monument of Time's slow changes, more ancient than the Egyptian Pyramids or the obelisk of Heliopolis. Its crystals were dew-drops and snow-flakes long before the human race was born in Eden. —Hayes Open Polar Sea.

A TRUE LADY.—I was once walking a short distance behind a very handsomely dressed young girl, and thinking, as I looked at her beautiful clothes, "I wonder if she takes half as much pains with her heart as she does with her body?"

A poor old man was coming up the walk, with a loaded wheelbarrow, and just before he reached us, he made two attempts to go into the yard of a small house; but the gate was heavy, and would swing back before he could get through.

"Wait," said the young girl, springing lightly forward. "I'll hold the gate open." And she held the gate till he passed in, and received his thanks with a pleasant smile, as she went on.

"She deserves to have beautiful clothes," I thought, "for a beautiful spirit dwells in her breast."

SOLIDIFIED GLYCERIN.—An English company are now manufacturing a toilet soap with which solidified glycerin is amalgamated in equal proportions by weight. The result is a semi-transparent tablet which lathers well and wears well, and deserves a wide popularity.

Submarine telegraphs to the number of 72, are now in successful operation.

Ancient Bible Manuscripts.—No. II.

MATERIALS OF ANCIENT SCRIPTURES.

In different ages and countries, writings have been found upon stones, shells, metal, bark and leaves of trees, wood, pottery, wax, cloth, skins, and various kinds of paper. The common material of the most ancient books we have is dressed calf or sheep skins. After being tanned soft and receiving from the dyer a red or yellow tinge, they were sewed together, with threads of the same material, into a strip sufficiently long to contain a whole book. Sometimes fifty or sixty skins were joined for a single work. The ends of the long strip were attached to rollers, and the reading progressed by unrolling the scroll. Hence we have the word volume, or roll, a history in itself of the revolving staff around which the ancient Scripture was wrapped. The writer once had the privilege of examining one of these bulky book-rolls. It was a Hebrew copy of the Pentateuch, written on a strip of faded, yellowish leather, which was nearly three feet wide, and must have been about a hundred feet in length. The book was undoubtedly a very ancient manuscript, though the age of fourteen hundred years which was claimed for it was considered unproved. It was said to be a Jewish synagogue Scripture, and was much worn at the edges by the use of centuries.

Next to these skins in durability as book material, and far above them in its universality of use, is parchment. Nearly five hundred years before the Christian era, Herodotus mentions it as having been in use for books from time immemorial. The most precious manuscripts which have come down through a period of more than thirteen centuries, and nearly all the choicest illuminated works, are written on parchment. It was esteemed so valuable that the ancients frequently discharged one writing from it and used it again for some other book. These re-written manuscripts, called palimpsests, are often of high antiquity, and also of extreme value, from the fact that the original writing, not entirely washed out, is still more or less distinctly legible.

Tables of solid wood have been used for books, usually legal documents, hence called codices, from whence we have our word code. Palm leaves and waxen tablets were used usually for letter writing and other temporary purposes; though two of these tablets, of the second century, were discovered not long since, and there is, in the university of Göttingen, a Bible of over five thousand palm leaves. A leaden book has been found, consisting of several thin leaves, with cover and hinges, all of lead.

But the chief material of ancient books was of a much more fragile character than any of these. Its extensive employment was due to its cheapness, which was second only to that of our modern paper. The papyrus plant, or reed, which formerly abounded on the banks of the Nile, once furnished by far the greater portion of book-material. It was of this plant that Isaiah spoke, "the paper-reeds by the brooks. . . . shall wither, be driven away, and be no more," a prophecy which has been exactly fulfilled. The modern traveler looks in vain along the marshes of the Nile for a plant which used to grow in such abundance, and was applied to such variety of uses. The ancient Egyptians made with it not only vast quantities of paper, but boats, sails, garments, coverlets, shoes; they distilled medicines from it, they gathered roots for fuel, and, according to Pliny, used the juice and pith of the plant to considerable extent as food. Its consumption in paper-making was so great as to form a prominent item in the commerce of ancient Egypt. Even down to the fifth century, Alexandria found paper manufactured from papyrus a very profitable branch of activity. Papyrus paper was singularly fragile, and unfitted for durable or constant use. It is probable that the first copies of the apostolic writings were on this material, which is incidentally alluded to in the Second Epistle of John. The papyrus fragments which have reached us from early times have either been interleaved and made firmer at every few pages with parchment, or have been kept from the ravages of time in tombs or buried cities. Numbers of papyrus rolls still exist, which are entirely illegible, being so matted together as to defy the utmost ingenuity to separate and decipher them. It was not until the eleventh century that our present paper came into such general use as to displace all other materials for books. A precise knowledge of the different materials used for ancient books enables the paleographer to determine with great exactness the age of a manuscript, and in some instances even the country of its manufacture. Many ancient processes of manufacturing book-material are now lost, so that it is simply impossible to fabricate a manuscript and palm it off on the expert antiquarian as genuinely ancient. A forger might with fair better prospect of success try to form the rival to a matchless painting or statue of some great master, and get his manufacture accepted as the genuine work of Phidias or Praxiteles, than counterfeit successfully the Vatican or Sinaitic manuscripts of the Holy Scriptures.

The marshy shores of the Nile gave the ancient world not only the chief share of its paper, but the largest number of its pens. The calamus, or reed pen, was in general use for writing on papyrus-paper and on parchment. The reed was small and hard; it was split into nibs and trimmed, like the quill. These reed-pens were often preferred after the introduction of the quill, and are still used in many parts of the Orient. They are mentioned by name in the thirteenth verse of 3d John. If the reader had before him several of the most ancient Scripture manuscripts, he would find hardly a copy in which the ink had retained its first blackness. Some are of a brown color, others of a deep red; in others, still, the writing is so yellowish and faded as to be hardly legible. This is usually the case if the parchment was left spongy, instead of being properly polished. Blue, red, purple, green, golden and silver ink were used, as well as black. It is rare that the whole manuscript is written in any of these colors. They are reserved for titles, superscriptions, marginal notes, and for capital letters, after they came into use. A few very valuable manuscripts were written wholly in colored inks; thus we have a copy of the Gospels in golden letters throughout, inscribed on purple parchment. The color of the ink, as well as that of the parchment, is much relied upon for testing the age of a manuscript, it being almost impossible to counterfeit the present faded appearance of the inks of antiquity.

COPYING AND COPIISTS.

There is little probability that the identical leaves on which an apostle or evangelist wrote were long in existence. The material of their writing was doubtless the papyrus-paper, which is alluded to in the twelfth verse of 2d John, which we have already seen to be very fragile and perishable. It is not likely that the apostolic autographs remained in existence more than a few generations. Jerome remarks of a library in Caesarea that its papyrus manuscripts had partly perished in less than a single century. If this was true of books carefully preserved in a library, it would be much more likely to be the case with autograph letters passing from hand to hand and from church to church. The most ancient Scripture manuscripts in existence are therefore not only copies, but probably copies of copies, at the third or fourth remove. Inquiry concerning the copying and copyists of antiquity thus comes into prominence in relation to our present subject. We shall find the evidence of the genuineness of ancient manuscripts in general, and particularly of Scripture manuscripts, confirmed by what can be known of the copying business. This was a distinct profession or trade. Those who received their livelihood by copying, gained custom, of course, in proportion to the neatness and faithfulness with which their work was done. This was a most powerful motive to fidelity. But there were also many amateurs in the work. Nobles, persons of wealth and rank, others of retiring and literary disposition, gave much time to the transcription of books. In the case of the Christian Scriptures, another very effective motive was added. It was long esteemed a meritorious religious act to transcribe a part or the whole of the Bible. Bishops, nobles, and princes often employed themselves upon the Scriptures as a pious duty, and esteemed themselves happy in aiding the good work of multiplying the sacred books. But in a few hundred years from the Christian era, the business of copying was almost entirely transferred to the monasteries. Each religious house had its copying-room, and its regular scribes, who gave their time regularly and industriously to an employment better suited than any other that can be imagined to the rules and usages, and to the modes of feeling peculiar to the monastic life. The mental and bodily inertness, which the spirit and rules of the conventional orders tended to produce, when conjoined to individuals with some measure of native industry, would find precisely a field for that lethargic assiduity which it needed in the business of copying books. One of the first imperial decrees after the foundation of Constantinople was an order for the preparation of fifty manuscripts of the Holy Scriptures "on fair skins by skillful calligraphists." But soon the multiplication of monasteries rendered any such decrees needless. The Constantinopolitan churches, libraries, and convents were great centers for the transcription of books for more than a thousand years. Throughout Asia Minor and the islands of the Aegean and eastern Mediterranean, the business of copying was actively pursued. The multitude of religious establishments on the sides of Mt. Athos, the monasteries of the Morea, Calabria, Western Europe, and the British Islands, contributed large numbers of manuscripts. Thus even the Romish distortions of religious life and its ancient superstitions have been providentially used for the transmission of ancient sacred literature. Monasticism found relief from its listless days and years in an occupation, an ulterior result of which was to be deliverance from its inert, empty formalities and oppressive superstitions. Luther found the Reformation in an old monastic Bible manuscript. The monks were giving to the world its Protestant Christianity when they transcribed the ancient sacred Scriptures. The copying-rooms of the monasteries preserved and renewed throughout barbarous ages those records without which our Protestant civilization had been impossible; and our Christianity itself a decaying tradition.

"Meanwhile along the cloister's painted side
The monks—each bending low upon his book—
With head on hand reclined—their studies plied;
Forbidden to parley, or in front to look,
Lengthwise their regulated seats they took.
The strutting prior gazed with pompous mien,
And wakeful tongue, prepared with prompt rebuke;
If monk asleep in sheltering hood was seen:
He, wary, often peeped beneath that russet screen.
Hard by, against the window's adverse light,
Where desks were wont in length of row to stand,
The gowned artificers inclined to write;
The pen of silver glistened in the hand.
Some on their fingers rhyming Latin scanned;
Some textile gold from bulls unwinding drew,
And on strained velvet stately portraits planned;
Here arms, there faces, shone in embryo view—
At last to glittering life the total figures grew."

DIFFERENT FORMS OF WRITING IN THE MOST ANCIENT BIBLE MANUSCRIPTS.

We have fragments of writing which were penned in the first century; and from that period to the invention of printing we do not lack specimens from the hands of each generation. There were marked changes in the character of the writing from one century to another, and these changes mark with considerable accuracy the date of many manuscripts. The text of the few Egyptian papyri of the first century which still exist is written in narrow, rudely divided columns. The letters are awkward capitals, called uncials. The sentences are not separated from each other. The letters are written continuously, not separated into words, and without marks of punctuation.

ORIGINALITY.

A complaint is often heard at the present day, from the mouths of literary critics, that there is little originality in the world of letters. Poets especially are accused of having nothing to say that has not been better said before, and of serving up over and over again the stale-meats of past times. The accusation is by no means confined to the case of poets. It is laid with less justice at the door of almost every school. Philosophers and historians, novelists and theologians, sculptors and painters, are all included in the same sweeping disparagement; and the ingenious analysts who dissect the current works of the age believe themselves able, in many cases, to pronounce upon the parentage and origin of the several ideas of which each work is composed. And some cynical people carry their disbelief in novelists so far as to assert, not merely that originality is rare, but that it is almost impossible. The materials on which poetry in particular depends are, they say, limited, and cannot be multiplied indefinitely. The number, they think, of human passions is, after all, not so great; and the situations to which their play gives rise are to be counted on the fingers. Love returned and love unrequited, jealousy and anger, pride and avarice, selfishness and generosity, go far to make up the tale.

There is a less variety in human nature than there is in landscape scenery; and one impetuous lover, except for the difference in the color of his hair or the circumstances in the midst of which he is placed, is very like another. Every faithful beauty is only an inappreciable variation upon Helen or Clytemnestra; all disappointed passion may borrow its language from Sappho, and after the narrative of Dido and Æneas every anecdote of seduction and treachery must be expected to be monotonous. Othello and Iago, Romeo and Juliet, make modern pictures of revenge, suspicion and romantic affection dull and tame.—Plautus and Terence are an epitome of all men and women ever since, only that the dresses and manners are archaic and antiquated; and there is nothing new in the world except perhaps the costumes of its inhabitants. Such critics are not therefore surprised at a want of originality, any more than they are surprised at the emptying of a mine whose treasures have already been dug up and used.

In discussing such a question it is desirable to be quite sure about the precise significance of words which one is employing constantly and freely, and "originality" is a term frequently bandied to and fro, but not altogether satisfactorily defined. Perhaps there is a little confusion of thought observable in the manner in which it is used. Occasionally it is applied to the mind of the producer; at other times to the literary result which he produces. In common parlance the result in both cases is treated as if it were identical, and a writer is condemned as unoriginal whose creations remind us of what we have seen before. To assume that the objective and subjective meanings of the epithet are necessarily indistinguishable is, however, a real error. It is possible to conceive of cases in which the distinction would become so plain as to attract the notice of the most superficial minds. The point of view from which we judge a book is not, properly speaking, the same as that from which we judge its author. There may be nothing fresh in the one, while there may be a great deal of freshness and genius in the other. The instance, for example, may be put of two equally powerful intellects striking, by an independent effort, upon the same idea. The circumstance is improbable, but its occurrence is not unknown; and even an imaginary case, however exceptional, is sufficient to illustrate the antiquity of our use of the word "original." To the public at large, and for all practical purposes, the one discovery is a mere echo and repetition of the other. The intellectual product sent into the market has been seen there before. Its value to the maker may be considerable, and the credit it reflects on his ingenuity unsurpassed; but its value in exchange is modified by the fact that it is not a novelty in itself.—Original genius thus seems not to have produced an original or new effect.

The illustration, though borrowed from the case of an extreme coincidence, may be useful to reflect light on our ordinary and common criticisms. The truth is that it is unjust and hopeless to measure an author's intellectual power by the freshness of the impression which the article he manufactures makes upon an educated public. Threadbare topics, old and worn situations, well-known incidents, and familiar passions may be the sole material on which genius has to work, and though the hand of a master can, under these adverse conditions, seldom fail to make itself felt, it is not felt in proportion to his real greatness. An angel cannot make a commonplace divine, and powers equal to those of a Milton or a Shakespeare may in theory be wasted every day for want of a vacant theme. Agamemnon, the poet hints, would have perished in obscurity but for an immortalizing Homer; and the converse is not less true, that many an embryo Homer may have never come to maturity for want of an inspiring Agamemnon. In the narrower sense of originality, it must be admitted that there is some monotony in the effect produced by many of the literary efforts of modern times. The monotony no doubt may be overrated. There has been a vast amount of life and of variety in the literature both of England and of other countries in the last eighty years. No one for example, can maintain that Mr. Carlyle's books, apart from any question of Mr. Carlyle's genius, are not in themselves novel and startling. Society has not been accustomed to have such writings presented to it, and was partly charmed and still more astonished and confounded, when it saw them first. What is true of Mr. Carlyle is true in a less degree of others.

The method in which history has been treated by Niebuhr, Grote, Buckle, and Macaulay—to take four widely dissimilar instances—has nothing trifling or effete about it. Passing from history to romance we find again, that in the novel a new class of works has risen into existence, marked by immense vigor and full of living interest. They are indicative of a peculiar kind of mental power, which is neither wholly imagination, nor wholly observation, but something half way between the two. There is nothing monotonous about Sir Walter Scott, or Balzac, or Mr. Thackeray, or Mr. Dickens. It is not however, in such a description of literature that poverty of invention would naturally show itself. Novels are not, as we have said, made up of mere imagination. They are mainly composed of description, though humor and imagination exercise an important influence upon the selection and arrangement of such incidents from daily life and of such types of contemporary manners as the artist determines to portray. If poverty of invention is really a disease with which the age is stricken, we should rather look to find its traces in the species of literature which depends more directly upon imaginative force.

And when we turn to poetry, there does seem to be some ground for the assertion that original thought is on the wane. No sacred poem of a modern date bears mark of the strength and sublimity that attract us to Milton. Shakespeare of course may be treated as a phenomenon with whom it is unfair to contrast the luminaries of any single generation. But independently of Shakespeare the earlier English drama has no modern rival. The lyric contemporaries of whom we are justly proud emulate their predecessors both in melody of verse and purity of sentiment, but are not their superiors in power. Even in comedy we have not of late years equalled Sheridan, any more than Sheridan himself was the equal of Molière. Meanwhile the mass of the poetry writers of the day are infected by an epidemic plague of imitation. They display their talents chiefly in reproducing the rhythms, the sentiments, and the mannerisms of others. They are always exploring Parnassus to pick up what by-gone explorers have left behind, but they cannot be said to plant the sacred hill with any fresh laurels of their own.

Yet when all is said that can be said upon this head, the importance of the distinction that we have mentioned between originality in the workman and originality in the work seems necessary to be remembered. If we are to fix our attention upon the latter alone, the charge that has been made against modern poetical literature would seem capable of application to nine tenths of the whole poetical literature of the world. There have been few poets who have not laid themselves open to it. We talk of Molière, but Molière is only Plautus in a French court-mask. His humor, his plots, his characters shine with a very borrowed light. We praise the English dramatists, but without the classical drama the English drama would never have existed, at all events in its present shape. No poet is hater of plagiarisms, or, to use a more polite expression, of adaptations, than Milton. Without the shepherds of Theocritus, and of his imitator Virgil, the pastoral romances of Europe and of the Elizabethan era would have been unknown. Pope owes his form, and something of his richness, to Ovid, to Horace, and to Juvenal. And, however far back we carry the investigation, the same result strikes us everywhere. Mr. Macaulay's school-boy could point out the obvious sources from which Roman literature itself came. The most original of Latin poets are usually thought to be Lucretius and Catullus. The more we study either, the more plain it is that both are an echo of something still more ancient.

Lucretius is a phase of Greek-Roman thought turned into verse, and modelled certainly on a foreign model. Catullus is Greek all over; some piece of Greek painting, poetry, or sculpture preserving itself almost in every line. Seneca is no more the producer of novelties than Racine.—Virgil and Horace pride themselves, not on having invented, but on having transplanted from elsewhere the thoughts for which they have been famous. Thus the golden chain of imitators has no end and no beginning. Go back as far as we may, we find scholars and students, not teachers or originators. The very artists whom we regard as pre-eminently classical seem, when we touch them, to be only a composite rechauffé of certain artists still. It is on this account that a large library appears, when we dive into it, to be made up of mere collections. One primitive thought may be discovered running through centuries of commentators and reproducers. Literature consists rather of the learning than of the inventions of the past; and the end of all research lands the student in the natural conviction that most things which have been well said were said very long ago, and have been repeated with varied success ever since, in thousands of volumes laid away in the dust of a hundred shelves.

Great men are, however, more original, as a rule, than the books they write; and the term "originality" comes to mean something intelligible when we begin to apply it to authors themselves. It signifies, in this case, a power of originating or creating, and is only another word for genius. How far one may be misled by confounding originality in an author with novelty of effect in his works, will be understood at once when we consider that one of the commonest and readiest shapes which genius takes is the faculty of imitation. This is apparent in the case of children, and it is equally apparent in the case of literary genius. Original form is the last achievement of a writer, and a man of force and energy often begins by borrowing his form from other great models, and by compelling his thoughts to flow in a groove that he finds already made. Milton, one of the first of imaginative poets, is an instance of this. He started with the purest reproduction of the classics, and was a copyist before he became an "inventor" of thoughts or of harmonies. He imitated Latin, he imitated Italian, he imitated Greek, and finally he grew to his full stature and invented English. The creative faculty and the imitation are indeed very near akin to one another, and the latter ripens often into the former. The ancient philosopher who said that all poetry was imitation really meant that it was what we should call a creative art. To reproduce is to produce again.—The process is the same, provided that it is carried out with equal energy; and vigor does not cease to be vigor merely because it starts upon a beaten track.

It may show itself, for example, in rearranging what other people thought, quite as much as in thinking out some novelty itself. Method, accordingly, is universally admitted to be one mark of mental vigor. The power of generalizing which is wanted for an historian or metaphysician is not much more than intelligent system; and a habit of attempting to classify phenomena ends usually in a faculty of perceiving laws or principles. It is obvious, moreover, that the power of arranging is a step towards that of rearranging thoughts. It is through method that inventions are made, both in science and literature and philosophy. When a man has once marshalled his ideas clearly, every additional idea he picks up is not merely another drop added to the bucket, but a fresh point of view gained. He is in the condition of general who has gained, not a new recruit, but a new position. And if method is of all things importance, it is clear that the essence of genius is force rather than novelty. The best view of originality is to regard it as equivalent to force. The notion that it is synonymous with something bizarre and extraordinary is one that does a good deal of mischief to society. In reality it is no more a symptom of force to wander outside the conventional path than to keep within it. The direction which originality takes may be an accident, or its virtue consists in its momentary rather than in its direction. It has nothing in common with clouderie, or with quaintness; and there is no greater mistake than to think that the literary comet is more original than the literary star.—Saturday Review.

The coal beds of Great Britain cover an area of 11,859 square miles. The known coal area of the United States is estimated at 20,939 square miles.

THE ARROW FIRE.—That this Tie is bound to supersede the use of rope in the baling of cotton, is evident to all who have ever seen it used, if from no other reasons than the security it gives cotton thus baled from fire, and the saving of space to ship owners in the decreased bulk of the bales thus secured.

We have watched the progress of iron banding for cotton for many years, from its introduction in New Orleans, in 1858, where we saw its fire-proof virtues fully tested on the levee of that city. A bale of cotton, thus secured, was mounted upon a pile of brick at each end, and a live lightwood fire built under it. The baling was all burnt off, the outside of the bale charred, but it could not be made to burn, although subjected to the severest tests.

In great cotton fires in the Crescent City, its virtues were always prominently illustrated. Though this was the case, did not come into general use, from the difficulty of fastening, and the liability of the bands to burst from the defective nature of the iron of which they were composed. The inventor of the Arrow Tie has fully overcome these defects. The Arrow Tie made in Liverpool of the best and most pliable English iron, while the simplicity and ease with which it is fastened is its greatest recommendation. Indeed, so quickly is this accomplished, that a prominent planter of Georgia has asserted that he has fastened four bands while a negro was tying one rope.

Of its protection to cotton in case of fire no better proof could be adduced than that given in the fire at Col. Chalmers' warehouse, on Thursday night last. The fire started among some rope-banded bales, which communicated the flames to the bales above in the tier, which very luckily proved to be secured by the Arrow Tie. These bales, though subjected to great heat, did not burst from natural expansion. They done so, the destruction of the warehouse and the balance of the cotton would have been assured, as the minute particles of burning cotton would have been scattered everywhere. The indestructibility of the Arrow Tie gave the firemen time to get water, and the fire was soon suppressed.

To these facts we attribute the preservation of the warehouse and its contents.—Macon Daily Telegraph.

SABBATH SONG.

BY ERNEST WARE.

O Thou whose courts of hallowed light
No human foot has trod;
We see not in thy radiant light
The palace of thy rest.

Nozophors from thy royal plains
Diffuse celestial balm,
Or wait to earth the wondrous strains
Of anthem and of psalm.

We hear no sound of waters free
Where saint and angel drink;
No rattle of the goodly tree
That sways beside the brink.

Yet even in this pilgrim land,
Across the dark, keep seen,
Full many a token from thy hand
Allures our souls to thee.

Thine the young morn, that up the sky
Dances on golden feet;
Thine the calm noontide reigning high,
And thine the nightfall sweet.

Thine is the music of the sea,
The melody of bird;
Thine the low-whispered harmony
Far in the forest heard.

But when from out the twilight shade
Steals in the Sabbath hour,
Methinks some mystic charm is laid
On sky, and field, and flower.

No brighter beams the eye of day,
No softer falls the even,
But to our hearts they seem to say
New words of hope and heaven.

Ah! is it not thy blessing's dew
Upon the holy time,
That all beneath it wears the hue
Of any Elysian clime?

Thus, on the peace thy Sabbath brings
O'er woodland, stream, and sea,
Our spirits stretch their eager wings,
And fly, dear Lord, to thee.

Sabbath at Home

From the Sabbath at Home.

THE STORY OF A POOR MUSICIAN.

TRANSLATED FROM THE GERMAN.

In a village not far from the capital, there lived a poor musician with wife and child, or rather children, for he had six of them. Things went hard enough with him, and he was not wanting in many cares, occasioned by his numerous family. His income was very small. On Sundays he played the organ in the church, and although the parish was wonderfully edified by the glorious sounds he emitted from the instrument with skillful hand, it never occurred to it to reward the modest artist. He received for his profession of organist twenty dollars a year, and with this sum the worthy peasants thought he ought to be satisfied.

Walther, for such was the name of the musician, was satisfied with it, and it never occurred to him to ask the austere village magistrates for an increase to this scanty salary. Even if they had withheld his yearly twenty dollars, he would still have gone on playing Sunday after Sunday in the church; for to sit at his beloved organ, and to let his harmonious tones bear his son as on wings to his God and Saviour, was his most heartfelt pleasure, his deepest delight.

But the twenty dollars, although Walther owed a small house, did not suffice to feed and clothe his large family. To be sure, it was not necessary to buy shoes and boots for the children, for in summer time the little boys and girls ran about barefooted, and in winter they had to content themselves with wooden shoes, which, if they were a little heavy, at least kept them warm, and did not need resoling, as leather ones would do. But the children must have clothes. Frau Walther made their garments of gray linen, woven and spun by herself, in order that they might not cost so much; but even this simple clothing cost money, and many times in the year friend Walther scratched behind his ear when his wife came and represented that Hans or Christian or Lotte must really have a new garment, because the old one was so torn that it could be patched and pieced no longer. Then they would take counsel together, and somehow or other, when their poverty reached its height, help would come from the most unexpected quarter. On account of his gentle, kind disposition, the villagers were very fond of Walther, and though it never occurred to them to raise his salary, which would have been the proper thing, yet, when he had played unusually well, they would send him gifts that often helped him amid his most pressing wants.

These, however, would not have hindered Walther and his family from suffering with hunger, if besides his art he had not also learned a trade, and that was the trade of a tailor. Besides, he often played at weddings and other festivals in the village, and this brought in some money, which was of great service to his family. In the long run, however, things went hardly enough with him, and many a time in the year he and his wife and children had to go to bed hungry, and many a noontide came when there was nothing to eat but a bit of dry bread, or a couple of potatoes sprinkled with salt; as for drink, they never had any thing but the clear, fresh water, that flowed into a fountain near the house.

With all their poverty and all their need, however, Walther's family were always cheerful, and they never lost, even in the worst times, their faith in God, and their hope for a better future. The six children bloomed like red poppies, and their simple mode of living kept them well, so that not one of them was ever sick. Father Walther sat all day hard at work, making jackets and coats for the peasantry, and never complained that the time seemed long to him. And he did not despise his trade, by any means, although he could play on the organ so well; "for," said he, "art brings me in but little, and trade stands on no golden but only a silver foundation, but without it we should long ago have gone to ruin."

But he loved his art above all things. Often, when he had been sitting at work till far into the night, busy with needle and shears, he would slip softly into the church, lock himself in, and play whatever his mood inspired. In such still hours he played most beautifully; and if a bearded traveler was passing, he would often stand by the church, and listen to the heavenly sounds that, full of strength and sweetness, pealed forth from the house of God. The pastor had often said, "The organist in the capital, who plays every Sunday to our gracious prince and noblemen, can not possibly play so well as our Walther; and it is a sin and a shame that such a man should be so miserably off in our village." He often tried to persuade Walther to go to the capital, and ask leave to play in the court church; but the modest man had always refused, and could not be persuaded to leave the village.

"If God only lets me keep what I have, I shall be well content," he would answer. "Here my music gives pleasure, but I should be laughed at at court. No, no, Herr Pastor! Do not try to tempt me to such a bold undertaking!"

And the good tailor, sexton, and organist staid at his post, and troubled himself very little with what was going on in the world.

At last, one wintry night, a great noise was heard in the village. The night watchman blew powerfully upon his horn, and the cry of "Fire! fire!" sounded fearfully through the streets. Every body sprang out of bed full of terror; the men rushed into the streets, and asked hastily, "Where? where?" "Walther's house!" was the answer, and every body crowded together, and rolled like a stream toward the abode of the poor man. All were ready to help and to save; but, alas! help came too late, for already the roof of the house was all in a blaze, and the people had as much as they could do to keep the next building from being devoured by the greedy flames.

Walther stood not far from his burning house, and looked sadly and with folded hands at the destruction the fire was making of his property. His wife and children stood about him, crying as if their hearts would break, and in their distress hardly able to control themselves. The father, though sorely troubled, spoke to them some words of comfort: "Do not be afraid, children, and do not despair! Our dear Lord still lives, and whatever he sends upon us we must consider as a providence, intended for our good. The loss is great, it is true; but God will still help us, as he has done hitherto."

"Bravely spoken, my man!" said the Herr Pastor, who stood near, and had heard Walther's words. "He who puts his confidence in God is not lost, and has a staff on which he can lean in every trouble." The neighbors and the rich farmers of the village came now, and offered the afflicted family a refuge in their houses: each wanted the privilege of taking Walther, with wife and children, to his home. This touched him deeply, and he said, with tears in his eyes, "See, children, how God himself makes the blossom of joy spring out of misfortune. Love lays its balsam on our wounded hearts, and help comes before our trial is over. Yes, yes, all things are for the best to them that love God!"

The family took refuge in the large house of the village magistrate, and fell asleep amid tears and prayers. Their hearts were full of trouble, but their faith in God sustained them, and kept them from sinking under their sorrow.

The next morning it was seen that of Walther's property not the smallest thing had been saved, except what little parents and children had upon their backs. And that was little enough. The sympathizing villagers provided for them the most pressing wants, and furnished them with warm clothing and with food; but their prospects for the future looked very gloomy, and Walther did not know how to should rebuild or refurbish his house. And as he sat brooding over his misfortune, thinking and thinking what would become of him, he remembered what the Herr Pastor had urged him to do.

"Yes," said he, "I will go to the capital, to our gracious prince, offer my poor services, and, if he will listen to me, will play upon the organ as well as I can. Perhaps our dear Lord will touch his heart, perhaps, he will have compassion on me, and give me some little salary on which, with economy, we can live. He is said to be such a good, benevolent man!"

Walther did not say a word to his wife and children about this plan, in order not to excite groundless hopes in them; but he went to the Herr Pastor, told him what he proposed to do, and begged him to give him a note to the prince, in which as much might be said in his favor as was consistent with truth. The pastor, a friendly, kind-hearted man, was quite ready to fulfill Walther's wish. He told him to return in an hour, and in the interval wrote to the prince, and gave the letter to poor Walther, with his best blessing.

In a few days Walther reached the palace. He ascended the wide stone stairs with a trembling step, and saw the doorkeeper before him, who looked at him scornfully from head to foot, and then asked in a harsh tone, "What do you want?"

Walther was alarmed at this rough salutation, and replied timidly, "I wish to see our gracious prince, and to hand him a letter from my pastor."

"A begging letter, no doubt!" cried the man. "Be off with yourself! The prince can not listen to every straggler that comes along!" These cruel words went like sharp swords through Walther's heart. He stood sadly before the door of the palace, his lips trembling, and with hot tears in his eyes.

"Well, what are you standing gaping there for?" cried the doorkeeper. "Must I show you the way down the steps?"

Walther sighed, and turned his back upon the palace, in order to go away. He had scarcely taken a couple of steps, however, when he felt a hand on his arm, and a kind, friendly voice said:

"Wait a little longer, my good man."

Walther looked round, and saw an old man, with bright, intelligent little eyes, which regarded him with sympathy and compassion.

"You wish to see our gracious prince?" he asked.

"Yes; but I am forbidden," replied Walther, in a choking voice.

"Softly, softly! Perhaps we can bring it about," said the old man, smiling. "This rude fellow can not prevent it, at any rate. I am the chamberlain of our gracious master, and if you will step into my little room, we can consider the matter."

Walther felt as if he were hearing a voice from heaven. He followed his protector with fresh courage, and when they had reached the little room told him frankly what business had brought him to the capital. The chamberlain inquired particularly into his circumstances, asking a hundred questions, which Walther answered with the most guileless honesty, and said at last:

"Dear Herr Walther, I feel your misfortunes very sensibly, for I see that you are a God-fearing, Christian man. In trust your pastor's letter to me. I will give it to the prince to-day, and then we must wait to see what he will decide. Keep up your courage, Herr Walther. God will never forsake one who trusts him as you do." Walther gave up the letter without hesitation. "And now," said his new friend, "pass away the time as you best can. If you have a fancy to try the organ in the palace chapel, go to the sexton, and tell him that I would like him to unlock the door, and admit you to the gallery. He will do it with pleasure."

"Will he really?" asked Walther joyfully. "May I really venture to play upon that splendid organ? Ah, I shall do it only too gladly!"

"Well, go then, go then," said the chamberlain, smiling. "In an hour or so I will come to the chapel for you."

Walther departed with a light heart, and soon reached the house of the sexton, which had been pointed out to him. Without delay he was admitted to the church, and seated himself at the organ, which he found a very fine one.

Never in his life had he been in such a mood as that in which he now found himself. The kind, gray-headed old chamberlain, although he had promised him nothing, had awakened joyful hopes in him, and his heart was full of love to him who had thrown him in the way of so good a friend.

He was delighted, too, that he could play on this large, beautiful organ, and with a powerful hand

he ran over the keys, and played the air to the sweet hymn—

"Commit thy every way,
And all that grieves and pains,
To that true Father-care
Which the whole world sustains."

The notes of the powerful organ resounded gloriously beneath the vaulted roof of the church. Walther, overcome by his own holy emotions, forgot every thing about him, fancied himself in his own little village church, where he often had exercised his powers in solitude, and kept winning from the organ more and more beautiful sounds, unmindful how the minutes were flying away, until an hour and a half had slipped by.

Suddenly he stopped playing, for a strange hand tapped him lightly on the shoulder, and a strange voice said:

"Well done, my new organist! Stop now, and speak with my chamberlain, who will have more to tell you."

Walther looked up, saw a tall, handsome man standing behind him, who nodded to him in a friendly way, but, without waiting for a word in reply, hastened away with rapid footsteps.

"Tell me, I beseech you, who was that gentleman?" he asked the chamberlain.

Joy sparkled in the eyes of the latter; his lips were covered with smiles; every feature showed how much excited he was: at last he said, in a voice full of emotion:

"Don't you know, your lucky man? It was the prince, our most gracious master, who has appointed you organist to the court!"

"It is too much, O my God!" cried Walther, nearly fainting with joy and surprise.

"Come with me, my good fellow," said his friend cheerfully; "in my little room at home I will find something to refresh you, and then I will tell you all that has happened."

He drew the bewildered Walther away, and when he had a little recovered himself, said to him:

"Listen, my good friend and court organist." Walther smiled at this new title. "When you told me the story of your misfortunes, which you had borne with courage and faith God only could have given, and when you added that you played the organ in your village, it occurred to me that our court organist wished to retire, owing to old age, and I thought I might kill two birds with one stone—help the one to repose, and the other to a good position. I sent you to the church to play, but told you nothing of my design, lest you should not play with ease and freedom. It was necessary that you should do that, for I had resolved to propose you to the prince as successor to our organist, and knew he would go to the church to hear you when I had told him all concerning you. It was important he should know. Every thing turned out as I thought it would. Our good, gracious prince accompanied me to the church, heard you play like an angel from heaven, and now you are a made man. Six hundred dollars salary, a house, all the wood you want; what would you have more?"

"O my God!" cried Walther, while tears of joy ran down his cheeks—"O my God! what have I done to deserve this happiness? What will my dear wife say when I return to her? How my children will rejoice! O my God! it is too much, too much! What have I done to deserve it?"

"Control yourself," said the chamberlain seriously. "God has sent you this good fortune because you were patient in trouble and joyful in hope. All things are for the best to those who love God. This is what you said when your house was burning; and so now he has fulfilled those words."

"And blessed be his name!" cried Walther, looking upward. "Oh, give thanks unto the Lord, for he is good, for his mercy endureth forever!"

We can imagine the joy that was felt by Walther's wife, his children, the Herr Pastor, and other friends, when he made known his good fortune to them. We need only add that Walther enjoyed his happiness with ceaseless gratitude to God, and in true friendship for the good old chamberlain whom he had chosen as the instrument of his own loving-kindness.

A few Facts for the Wearers of Chignons.

TRANSLATED FROM THE GERMAN.

In a recent number of the St. Petersburg Notes, we make the acquaintance of an invisible horror, which, however, on account of its existence in such large quantities, and the danger of its dissemination, is even more frightful than that well-known and similar monster, the Trichine. The St. Petersburg paper founds its statements upon medical and scientific authority, and investigations which have for the first time been made known by the German naturalist, Herr Lindemann, in the "Archives of Official Pharmacy and Public Hygiene," a journal published in St. Petersburg. He says in substance as follows: That he has more closely investigated a new microscopic parasitic animalcule, named Gregarine—that is, infusoria which make their appearance in herds or broods. These animalcules are protozoa, and belong to the very lowest phase of the development of the animal organism. They exist only as parasites, but are thus found in almost all parts of the animal and human system—even in the blood. With the latter they circulate throughout the body, and, nourished by the blood itself, increase so much in dimensions that they can no longer follow their inclination to ascend into the inner minute tubes of the hair, but finally are obliged to remain stationary in the body, or indeed in some part of the hair itself. Here the Gregarine increase with such rapidity that they soon form whole colonies, choke and obstruct the blood-vessels, and are thus the cause of a long list of diseases, such as hydrophy, asthma, the so-called Bright's disease, etc. They make their appearance in the most striking manner in the human hair; but hair filled with these Gregarine can be distinguished from healthy hair only by the magnifying-glass, or by the keenest eyesight, and then only by little dark-brown knobs, which are mostly found near the extremities of the hairs. These little knobs are whole colonies of Gregarine. Herr Lindemann at a hair-dresser's in Nishni-Nowgorod examined thirty different specimens of hair, twenty of which he found infected with Gregarine. He made inquiry as to the localities from which the hair-dressers preferred to obtain their hair, and found that it had in most cases been taken from the heads of the very poorest people, especially from the matrons and maidens of the Mordvine and Burlake on the Volga. When in the spring-time the Burlake goes forth to work, he puts on, perhaps, a clean shirt, but he certainly does not take it off until he returns in the autumn. It is not to be wondered at, that, leading such manner of life as this, vermin, those natural scourges of uncleanness, should soon appear upon his person and increase to a horrible extent. By some of his later experiments, Herr Lindemann has discovered that almost every species of these parasitic vermin, especially one very disagreeable variety, whose name we will not mention to ears polite, contain in their intestinal canals a vast multitude of these Gregarine, and, by further experiment, he convinced himself most thoroughly that the Gregarine of the human hair come from these vermin.

But how do the Gregarine make their way into the flesh and blood of mankind?

Herein the ladies are the principal culprits—actual ladies, charming creatures in tasteful ball attire—who, decked with flowers, sparkling with jewels, radiant with wit and animation, in the full enjoyment of life, seem also to shed around them only happiness and pleasure. No, this sounds so horribly that we must at least restrict our accusation, and limit it to the coils and twists of their own and other people's hair which ladies of fashion wear in greater or less rolls upon the back part of their heads, under the name of "chignons."

This is the way in which it comes to pass. Herr Lindemann convinced himself by many experiments that the Gregarine do not die from want of moisture, and also that they can not be destroyed by boiling. (?) The agents, by means of which they could be killed, such as acids, alkalis, ether, etc., could not be used for this purpose, because they also injure the hair itself. There is nothing left, therefore, for the hair-dressers but to make use of the hair which they have purchased, no matter how full of Gregarine it may be, for the manufacture of ladies' chignons and head-dresses. But Herr Lindemann likewise convinced himself that the Gregarine are restored to animation and activity even by a very slight elevation of the temperature, and, especially by an allusion of moisture or vapors, quickly grow, and in a few hours arrive at that stage of complete development which results in their rapid increase in numbers. Now we shall see how they are introduced into the interior of the human system. Under the most brilliant phase of modern society does this take place. Imagine to yourself a ball-room! The blazing lights, the dancing, the crowd of people, soon raise the temperature, and increase the moisture in the atmosphere to such an extent that the countless invisible little monsters in the masses of false hair which the ladies wear upon their heads are speedily vivified in multitudes, rapidly grow and increase, and as is the case among these inferior orders of animal life, are multiplied by division into myriads of embryos. These are dispersed throughout the atmosphere of the saloons in millions, are inhaled, fall upon the refreshments offered to the guests—in short, are introduced into the systems of those present in a hundred different ways, penetrate and poison all parts of the body, and multiply to such an extent that, like legions of evil spirits, they rise again, disperse themselves through the hair, and disseminate anew on all sides their seeds of corruption. A horrible picture! May the ladies soon learn to shrink with disgust from the mounds teeming with disease and uncleanness, which they build up with false hair upon their heads and necks already so lovely without the addition of foreign charms, and to content themselves in future with the adornments of their own natural hair.

To physicians and men of science the serious task offers itself of examining and testing more narrowly the discoveries of Herr Lindemann, in order that, in case they are shown to be accurate and well-grounded, the proper means may be taken to prevent the spread of this scourge. Meanwhile, however, the ladies will do well to abstain in future with heroic resolution from adorning themselves, if not with borrowed plumes, at least with themselves with appearing to much better advantage without artificial bunches on their necks.

TRICHINIASIS.—The scavenger habits of the rat certainly render the contents of his entrails living poison to the viler animal that devours them, and thus a prolific source of trichiniasis in swine. A committee of the Vienna Medical Society have made an elaborate report in which they maintain that the disease also originates in the rat; a large percentage of rats examined in different towns and countries having been found trichinized. It is also found that the germs of trichiniasis may be conveyed from infected meat to other food by the larvae of flies; which shows how a rat or other animal may become trichinized without eating either trichinized flesh or intestines containing germs. Prof. Brown, in a lecture before the Society for the advancement of Science and Art, in this city, stated that this parasite originates almost entirely in the swine, and is there invisible to the naked eye. When flesh containing the trichiniasis is introduced into the human stomach, the flesh is dissolved and the parasite unloosed from its cell. When this occurs the parasite is about one thirtieth of an inch in length. Birth is then given to trichiniasis, which straightway proceed to penetrate the whole muscular and flesh system through the alimentary canal. These young trichinias are at first only one five hundred and fortieth of an inch in length, and resemble a worm in spiral coil. By the time they traverse the system however, they increase in size many fold, and then begin to make felt that terrible disease to which they have given the name. As first introduced into the animal they cause trouble only by the production of their offspring. The disease is first made apparent by pains in the joints, the head, and the spine, and the patient gradually wastes away and dies. The trichinias do not create disease by eating away the flesh—which they are not fitted to do—but by hindering or closing up the forces and processes by which health is preserved. From one of the limbs of a girl who had died in this manner lately in Springfield, Mass., a portion of muscle was detached and subjected to microscopic examination. A square inch of this disclosed from 30,000 to 80,000 trichinias.—Scientific American.

PROFESSOR AGASSIZ' immense collections in Brazil have been in good part opened and arranged (except about sixty packages) in the museum of Comparative Zoology at Cambridge. They include 50,000 specimens of fishes, representing over 2,200 species, 2,000 of which are supposed to be new to science. This collection now exceeds those of the British Museum and Jardin des Plantes united, containing altogether more than 2,000 species.

STABLE'S PROCESS OF BEEF PACKING, now in use in Texas, consists substantially in substituting carbonic acid for air in contact with the meat. A little salt is used, and the cone removed, and the meat is placed in cans in carbonic acid in an airtight box.

How to send money.—We are frequently receiving enquiries upon this point. We have scarcely lost anything by the mails, and consider them safe. The risk at any rate will be ours.

We are still asked shall we forward money by mail? Answer, YES. The Agent will notice, as above, that the risk is not his.

To subscribers.—Any person wishing to subscribe for this paper can do so, by paying the Methodist preacher in the circuit, and forwarding to us his receipt for three dollars, with the address of the subscriber upon it, stating Post office, State, Circuit, and Conference. The receipt ought to be taken in duplicate.

PERSONAL.—The editor-in-chief left for Baltimore last week. The ADVOCATE will "edit itself" even more impersonally than ever during his absence. We are to have weekly letters, however, in place of those leaders, which we should otherwise greatly miss.

HEALTH OF THE CITY.—The new street commissioner appointed by General Sheridan is apparently doing better than the old incumbent. The cleaning up is done in the night, and we find the streets and gutters as clean as a pin when we wake up in the morning. Military law has its advantages. The Board of Health report three fatal cases of cholera in private practice, and one death from yellow fever in the Charity Hospital. The health of the city, however, is considered good for the season of the year. Quarantine from infected ports is strictly enforced, and the health officers of the city are pushing their visitations into every nook and corner. If these precautions are of much value, we shall have no epidemics this summer. We are having warm and showery weather.

DOLBEAR'S COMMERCIAL COLLEGE.—In another column will be found a list of the monthly graduates of this valuable Institution, and also a card to the ladies. These are practical times, and institutions of this character are meeting the peculiar demand. Here young men, and young ladies, too, can soon be prepared for business and usefulness. Every body ought to have a practical business education. If possible, secure a full collegiate course, but by all means let every young man master the practical details of penmanship and accounts. An acquaintance with these things will be of advantage to men in all pursuits. Many situations now filled by able-bodied young men ought to be filled by ladies, and the gentlemen should be in the out-door battle of life. Mr. Dolbear, as an educator, is long and favorably known, and needs no commendation from us.

The commerce of Galveston, Texas, it is estimated, will reach $80,000,000 this year.

MISSIONARY EMIGRATION.

It is estimated that more than sixteen thousand of our Southern people have already settled in Brazil. A vessel leaves this port, in a few days, with about three hundred passengers for the same destination. Many have gone to Venezuela. Some have gone to Honduras, and there is every indication of a continuous exodus. The emigrants, so far, are among the best of our people, thrifty, industrious, religious, and often possessed of considerable means.

The Methodist Church South is largely and respectfully represented in every ship that sails. The Central and South American States will soon be dotted over with colonies from our shores. Our civilization, language, customs, improvements, and religion will be carried and planted by them throughout these vast and hitherto almost unexplored regions. Is God thrusting out a people into the regions beyond, and compelling us to enter a door which our misfortunes have thrown wide open? Providence seems to point in this direction, and to the Christian this movement is full of hopeful meaning.

Single missionaries sent here and there could make but little impression upon the Catholic population of Spanish and Portuguese extraction. And the native Indian population of these countries have become so shaped and imbued by Romanism as almost to defy the ordinary instrumentalities of Protestantism. We are disposed to think that this aboriginal, Creole compound, upon which Romanism has acted as a mordant to fix all the dyes of superstition and degradation, is the most difficult subject upon which the missionary can work. The spiritual capabilities and religious intuitions are gone, and there is scarcely enough of conscience left to form the basis of instruction and appeal. Here in South Louisiana we have often come in contact with a mongrelism akin to that which exists in the Spanish American countries, and we doubt whether China is as hard a soil for Gospel culture.

Yet here are millions without the Gospel, inhabiting the most favored regions, and within a bow-shot of our mission rooms and Bible houses. Impelled by an almost imperious necessity, thousands of Protestants are now swarming thither. They are taking with them their faith, their ministers, their Bibles, and their worship. The motive that leads them there is not chiefly religious—perhaps not religious at all—but the providential purpose and result are intimately connected with the advancement of Christ's kingdom. Homes, security for life and property, and openings for business enterprise and fortune are the objects sought. But in securing these ends they are establishing powerful centers of light and influence, which may slowly but surely leaven a nation, or even a continent. What the single-handed missionary never could have accomplished, these colonies may in time succeed in doing. We do not expect these results to ripen at once. The process of assimilation must be slow, but the light is beginning to dawn.

These emigrants are taking balm with them, and its healing power will be felt. Incidental as this missionary idea may be to ourselves, in God's plan it may be the chief intent. Many ministers are going, or have already gone. Our impoverished missionary treasury is not drawn on for their support. These emigrant missions will be self-supporting, making their own way, and depending upon their own resources. The preachers go to share with the people in the adventures and hardships and benefits of the enterprise, but their ministrations will promote the spiritual welfare of the colonists, and they will in many instances enter the fields of labor whitening around them.

Whether our emigrants see in their own movements, and in the calamities which impel them, the hand of Providence as we see it, or not, the part which they may be performing in the evolutions of Christ's kingdom is a fact still. But we wish they could see and feel the real nature and greatness of their mission. It would go far to reconcile them to the causes which have led to their expatriation, and the very thought would assure them of the divine protection, and cheer them in their wanderings. The act would be dignified, and the motive would be ennobled by the conviction that they are doing something for God: If every Christian who goes maintains his consecration as living "unto the Lord," and sustains his character as "the light of the world," and, above all, if every preacher remembers his ordination vows, these far off lands will be vocal after awhile with the Redeemer's praise.

There is danger, however. The service of God, and the duties of religion, are easily neglected amidst the material interests of the hour. The spirit of speculation may grow into a mania, the sober and rational objects originally contemplated may be wildly cast aside by haste for riches, and in the turmoil mammon will turn God out of the soul. Preachers may feel themselves providentially released from that consecration which at home gave the bulk of their time to the exercise of their calling, and thus enter too absorbingly into secular affairs. Circumstances may compel a large diversion of time and attention to temporal matters, but the character of a minister and ambassador for God ought not to be overshadowed by them. In the great and providential ends which we believe to be in this emigration movement, and in the peculiar difficulties and temptations which are incidental to it, there is need that Christians engaged in it—ministers and laymen—should be vigilantly faithful to their high calling, as witnesses for Christ and as the salt of the earth. They have need to estimate themselves in the character of missionary emigrants, fulfilling the high behests, to which God has called them, of enlarging the domain of truth and of spreading scriptural holiness over lands which, of all others, are by nature most highly endowed and blessed.

REGISTRATION IN LOUISIANA.

The progress of registration thus far is shown in the subjoined table, which we take from the Picayune of the 19th inst. The time for registration expires on the 30th. We have seen no order from the Commander of the District extending it. Registration, however, may be re-opened, we suppose, but we have no intimation of any such purpose at this present writing. The table will enable our readers to form some notion of the probable results at the ballot-box. If registration is done, the next step will be an election for a convention and the members thereof. After that, if a convention is decided upon, will be the approval of the new constitution, election of State officers and members of Congress, and then formal application to Congress for admission into the Union. How rapidly all these steps shall be taken depends upon the will of General Sheridan, and that again depends upon the will of the July Congress. That all of these matters are to be manipulated and shaped to fit the radical bedstead is clear. We doubt whether any State will be admitted unless it knocks with a radical knuckle, and gives the pass-word of the dominant party.

Removals and Appointments.

The following extracts from the opinion of the Attorney General, on the power of District Commanders to remove from and appoint to civil offices, legislative, judicial, and executive, comes by telegraph.

WASHINGTON, June 17.—The opinion of the Attorney General is too elaborate for telegraphing, and the reasoning too close for a synopsis. The following verbatim extracts cover the conclusions:

I find it impossible, under the provisions of this act, to comprehend such an official as Governor of one of these States appointed to office by one of these military commanders. Certainly he is not the Governor recognized by the laws of the State, elected by the people of the State, and clothed as such with the chief executive power.

Nor is he appointed as a Military Governor, for a State which has no lawful Governor, under the pressure of an existing necessity, to exercise powers at large.

The intention, no doubt, was to appoint him to fill a vacancy, occasioned by a military order, and put him in the place of the removed Governor, to execute the functions of the office as provided by law. The law takes no cognizance of such an official, and he is clothed with no authority or color of authority.

What is true as to the Governor, is equally true as to all other legislative, executive, and judicial officers of the State. If the military commander can oust one from his office, he can oust them all, and if he can fill one vacancy, he can fill all, and thus usurp all civil jurisdiction into his own hands, or the hands of those who had their appointments from him and subject to his power of removal, and thus frustrate the very right secured to the people by this act.

Certainly this act is rigorous enough in the power which it gives. With all its severity, the right of electing their own officers is still left with the people and must be preserved.

I must not be understood as fixing limits to the power of the military commanders in case of an actual insurrection or riot. It may happen that an insurrection in one of these States may be so general and formidable as to require the temporary suspension of all civil government, and the establishment of martial law in its place, and the same may be true as to local disorder or riot, in reference to the civil government of the city or place where it breaks out.

Whatever power is necessary to meet such emergencies, the military commander may properly exercise. I confine myself to the proper authority of the military commander where peace and order prevail.

When peace and order do prevail, it is not allowable to displace the civil officers and appoint others in their places, under any idea that the military commander can better perform his duties or carry out the general purposes of the act by the agency of civil officers of his own choice rather than by the lawful incumbents.

The act gives him no right to resort to such an agency, but does give him the right to have a sufficient military force to enable him to perform his duties and enforce his authority within the district to which he is assigned. On the suppression of insurrection and riot the military commander is wholly independent of the civil authority, so too in the trial and punishment of criminals or offenders, he may supersede the civil jurisdiction. His power is to be exercised in these special emergencies, and the means are put into his hands by which it is to be exercised, that is to say, sufficient military force to enable such officer to perform his duties and enforce his authority, and that of military tribunals of his own appointment to try and punish offenders.

These are strictly military powers to be executed, not by the civil authority, or by civil officers appointed by him to perform ordinary civil duties. If these emergencies do not happen, if civil order is preserved and criminals are duly prosecuted by the regular criminal courts, the military power, though preserved, will remain passive.

Its proper function is to preserve the peace, to act promptly when the peace is broken, and restore order. When that is done, and the civil authority may again safely resume its functions, the military power becomes again passive, but on guard and watchful.

This, in my opinion, is the whole scope of the military power conferred by this act, and in arriving at this construction of the act, I have not found it necessary to resort to the strict construction which is allowable.

The famous Tredgar iron works are in full blast near Richmond, employing 400 men.

Congress to Meet in July.

This seems probable. The ability that the President may interfere with the district commanders are strong reasons. The radicals must meet to watch over this reconstruction business. The South must be Afro-radical.

WASHINGTON, June 17.—Wood's excursion passed Peoria, Ill., to day. Fifteen Senators of the party expressed their determination to be in Washington for the July session. Those with the party joined Wade in a telegram to Schenck, Chairman of the National Congressional Union Committee, to advise all Republican Senators and Representatives to be present. There is now little doubt of a July session. As an illustration of the dominant sentiment, the following concluding paragraph of the Tribune editorial is telegraphed.

"Above all, and here we approach the crime of the opinion. This is not the construction intended by Congress and accepted by the Administration and the country in this respect. The Attorney General is dishonest, he is a partisan endeavoring to prepare the country for a great wrong. We are afraid we cannot trust the President. He seems to have the fatal faculty of blundering, of getting himself and his friends into trouble, of bringing peril to the country. Nothing seems to annoy him so much as peace. We believe he means, if he dares, to strike a blow at the reconstruction policy of Congress and bring up from the pit of sin and iniquity the shameless policy by which he sought to deprive a race of its dearly earned rights. We must show him that he dare not. Congress should assemble in July and address itself again to reconstruction. We must make this bill so plain that even Stansberry may understand it, and so comprehensive that the President cannot escape its execution. We regret that the administration has forced another issue upon the country—we must promptly meet it.

Military Order in Mississippi.

The following order is important to neighbors of Mississippi. There is nothing like military law for directness, and prompt execution. So much better than the circumlocution of legislative and civil processes.

HEADQUARTERS FOURTH MILITARY DIST.,

[General Orders No. 12.]

I. With a view to secure to labor in this district his hire or just share of the crops, as well as to protect the interests alike of debtors and creditors from sacrifices of property by forced sales in the present impoverished condition of the country, it is ordered that all proceedings for the sale of land under cultivation, or of the crops, stock, farming utensils or other materials, used in tilling such lands, in pursuance of any execution, writ or order of sale, issued in any cases where the debt or other cause of civil action was contracted or accrued prior to the 1st day of January, 1866, be stayed and suspended until after the 30th day of December, 1867. In the meantime, all interferences, under color of any such legal process, with the lawful tenant in cultivating or gathering the growing crops is prohibited; provided that the rights or remedies for a recovery of debts, at any time, of parties to whom the crops have been hypothecated for money, stock or other means or material supplied in the cultivation of the land, shall not be hereby prejudiced or postponed.

This order to go into effect from and after the 20th day of June, 1867, in the State of Mississippi, and from and after the 30th day of June, 1867, in the State of Arkansas.

II. It having been reported that corn, so much needed by the poor of this district, is being made into whisky illicitly, Sub-District and Post Commanders are directed, when they can learn of the existence of any distillery engaged in manufacturing whisky, to inform themselves whether it pays the legal taxes, and if not, seize it and all the liquor they can find, and as poverty increases where whisky abounds, the property seized will be sold for the benefit of the country in which it is found and the money will be divided under the direction of the Registration Board for that county, to whom it will be duly turned over.

Sub-districts and post commanders are entrusted with the execution of this order. III. When complaints are made by citizens that they have been persecuted by the civil authorities for opinions sake, such complaints will be entertained by post commanders in this District, who after carefully inquiring into all the circumstances, taking testimony under oath of both parties, will forward a report of their investigation, accompanied by the affidavits, to these headquarters.

Official

A special order from Gen. Sheridan, No. 72, declares null and void the second section of ordinance No. 10, adopted by the police jury of the parish of Ouachita on the 25th of February last, requiring "that the Informant shall be liable for cost in cases of prosecution." The General commanding declares this regulation has "the effect to operate against the poorer classes of people, especially colored citizens; and is also at variance with the laws of Louisiana."—Exchange.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

TALLADEGA, ALA., June 12, 1867.
Mr. Editor: I have been quite industrious in endeavoring to circulate church papers on my circuit. The objections are mainly two, namely, scarcity of money and postmasters. The proposed now is, that these objections are likely to be partially removed. Meanwhile, my answer to the question in the discipline—"Is the literature of the church circulated and read?"—is, that I carry my three Advocates—namely, New Orleans, Nashville, and Macon, also the Monthly—me, and read them to the families I visit as well as on all suitable occasions. Yea, editors may object to this, and say that while I carry the papers to the people and read for them, that they will not subscribe. Nay, I trust this will prove an effectual way to secure a more useful as well as wider circulation. I find this convenient helps, even to the pulpit; and they come frequently alike in place, either before or after sermon; not so much account of the doctrines (although in them they are not defective) as for their aid in the practical application of the Gospel.

I entered upon my work this year profoundly impressed with the importance of working while it is day. This being the sixty-fifth year of my life, I believe in Mr. Jefferson who advised me to take things by the handle. Well, the first thing was to discover where the handle or handles of my circuit were. Having found them, I proceeded at once to handle it—vigorously.

The crops, the crops is the great thing. It suggests an apt illustration of my labors. Am I not cultivating Immanuel's land? Am I not greatly interested in the crop growing in these broad lands? Here seed was sown years ago, and with the tears of Newman, Foster, Pettine, Curry, Perry, Smith, and others, may I not hope to return at the end of the year, bringing some of their sheaves, as my own, with me?

Imagine a farmer working hard, and early, during the spring and summer. He prepared his ground well, got his crop in in good time, been diligent in plowing and hoeing, breaking the clods; and by dint of toil has killed all the grass and weeds, a word, his crop is clean. "T is Saturday night I see him, as he returns from field, lifting his eyes to the clouds; he voluntarily prays, 'Now, Lord, send refreshing showers.' So I feel as I pray. I, too, have tried to cultivate lands of Immanuel's after the most improved style. I subsoiled as deep as strength of my team would allow. I ploughed close to the corn. Some plow the grass and weeds were rank and high, but I hope I have not injured the corn this thorough cleaning.

One more item. I find there is rust in some of the church members, as well as the wheat. But my brethren tell me it is confined to the blade (the heart, the heart). They say I have not been diligent as I ought, or have been. But love God. My heart is right. I will be better. I believe you brethren, now let me admonish you that the way keep that rust from the stem (the life) is to get it off the blade as soon as possible. I would like to write more the Fayetteville circuit, but I fear I will require more room than you can give of your excellent columns.

DANIEL DUNCAN

BENTON, MISS., June 14, 1867.
YAZOO CIRCUIT—MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE.

Mr. Editor: This circuit is in the northern part of Yazoo county, and composed of six white and four colored churches, with a membership of about a hundred.

The colored churches, though included in the same pastoral charge with regular circuit, have been organized into separate Quarterly Conference, with fifteen official members. They are in very prosperous state, about fifty have been baptized and received into their communion this year. Steps have been taken at two places to provide them with a place of worship of their own, and by next I think they will be both able and willing to support a pastor of their own.

The regular circuit is also prospering. Several have been added to the church, and we trust they are as well as saved.

In the town of Benton we have had an encouragement. Eighteen have been received this year—twenty by certificate, six from the world. We have had a protracted meeting here, and have made no special effort to "get up" a revival, have simply attended our monthly appointments, held our weekly prayer meetings, and regular church meetings, organized Sabbath-school, revived class meetings, and attended to our pastoral duties. The Holy Spirit is in our midst, and success seems to be attending our labors, which the Lord has praised.

It is encouraging to see our young turning away from the alluring pleasures of the world, and consecrating themselves to the service of God with calm determination, as we have seen them do here.

May they be pillars in the temple of God! The future prospects of the church look bright while such is the state of the world.

I will just add that our organ and choir of which some will disapprove—are not in a "loft" or "box," in the church, but down in the congregation in front of the altar, where, in the humble judgment, all church choirs ought to be.

Street Sunday-School Library.

Bro. R. J. Harp, pastor of this charge, has furnished us with a most complete and recently printed Catalogue of this Library. Eleven hundred new volumes have been added, making a total of over three thousand volumes, many of which are new editions of large and standard works. The character of the library is described in an extract from the

The greatest caution and most assiduous care have been exercised in the selection of books from the lists of forty-seven publishing houses, in Europe and America, to constitute the cream of literature adapted to such libraries—calculated to instruct and instruct; combining what is useful in style, pure in diction, and lofty in conception, with that which is chaste in expression and states in its moral tone.

In addition to the main Library contained in this Catalogue, the School has six hundred volumes of Books for children, and a large assortment of Bibles and Bibles, and supplies of semimonthly with an Illustrated Paper.

After many months of arduous labor in procuring and procuring these books, we have them to their readers, with the hope that they may be an invaluable blessing to the young people of the district.

It is our intention to enrich our stalls, from time to time, by adding new and valuable publications, as our means enable us to do so.

To fully understand and appreciate all that has been done, the Library must be seen. It is worth a visit to the School to see the shelving, arrangements, and all appointments of the Library room are of high perfection. Money has been liberally expended on this object. The Church and Sunday-School are incomparable with a good library—books for old as well as for the young. The past and brethren of Moreau street deserve praise for their efforts in this enterprise. We know of no Church or Sunday-School library equal to this.

LATEST NEWS.

Trial of Surratt.

WASHINGTON, June 19.

John Fisher decided that the prosecution need not furnish a list of witnesses to be called, and against the right of the witnesses for cross-examination at any time during the trial. The fact has been developed during the argument that the prosecution have seventy witnesses.

Charles H. Bina, watchman at the Vermont Central Railroad Depot, testified that one, one of whom left a headkerchief and a watch, and against the right of the witnesses for cross-examination at any time during the trial. The fact has been developed during the argument that the prosecution have seventy witnesses.

Correll Hobart, conductor on the Vermont Central road testified that he carried two men, one of whom looked like the prisoner, towards Canada.

Correll agreed to admit railroad time as evidence.

Mr. Triplett—Heard conversation between Mrs. Surratt and the prisoner. (The latter said she would give a thousand dollars to kill the President.)

Thought he heard the prisoner, who was a Union victory, curse the army. To this the defense objected, and the evidence was admitted. The evidence, introduced to confirm the opinion of Surratt's presence here on the night of the assassination was heard, and nothing striking was developed. Court adjourned.

The Cabinet session lasted from 10 until 12, when the President, Stanton and Secretary had a prolonged interview. Mr. Admiral Stephen C. Rowan has been assigned to the command of the Atlantic Squadron.

The Department of State has information that the court martial in the case of Maximilian has been suspended for the present.

The internal revenue receipts to-day were $446,000.

The Cabinet is in session to-day, making the third consecutive day.

Gen. Pope telegraphs Gen. Grant that a letter that accuses have been applied to the municipal government of Mobile, but that the offices are filled from the best people of the city. He states that Gen. Swayne is on his way to Washington.

Nothing authentic has transpired regarding the Cabinet meeting to-day.

The Executive Order is not yet completed.

James Newton, late Commissioner of Agriculture, died to-day.

New York, June 19.—The Express says it has private but thoroughly authentic advice that Juarez's forces were severely repulsed at Tampico. The garb of the battle was "Viva Santa Anna!"

Stanton has been proclaimed President of the Republic.

The American schooner United States, with emigrants from Wilmington, N. C., has arrived in Guayana.

The revolution in Venezuela had been quelled.

The great scarcity of rain in Jamaica threatened the sugar crop, which would be very light, but an abundant coffee crop was expected.

Capt. Fry, of the American schooner Charleston, was drowned at Port Tyo.

CHARLESTON, June 19.—The comments upon Gen. Sickles's course, contained in the Attorney General's opinion, published here this morning, has created a profound sensation. Gen. Sickles has to-day forwarded a request to Washington to be relieved from duty as commander of this district, and demanded a Court of Inquiry on his official action.

Riot at Birmingham.

London, June 18.—A formidable anti-Popery riot is progressing at Birmingham. The rioters in strong force. A Roman Catholic chapel had been attacked and threatened with demolition. Intense excitement prevails. At 3 p.m. the rioters are in full possession of the city of Birmingham. All efforts to preserve order proved futile.

Large bodies of troops have been sent to the scene of disturbance, with orders to put it down at all hazards.

The Bank of Holland has reduced the rate of interest to 2½ per cent. A Reform mob attacked a Tory meeting last night at St. James Hall, stormed the platform and erected a red flag, surmounted by a Liberty cap.

There was much fighting and many arrests were made.

From Mexico.—A letter from San Luis Potosi, dated May 28th, gives the following additional particulars of Maximilian's trial.

"On the 25th inst. Maximilian, Miramon and Mejia were placed in separate cells, under double guard, and a court-martial was organized to try them. Since the days of the Spanish inquisition no such tribunal has ever been framed. Who the President is no one knows. Where court sits and who are the witnesses is equally a matter buried in the darkest obscurity. The Judge Advocate has fourteen points of accusation. With these he passes from one to the other of the prisoners, and asks them on each point what they have to say in reply. In vain the Emperor requested time to consult his counsel, naming as such the Liberal General Rivas, Pallacio and Senor Martinez de la Lora, of Mexico city. In vain he protested against the legality of the court.

These proceedings have been going on for 3 days, and to-morrow the sentence is expected to be given. If that sentence is passed it will undoubtedly be death, and the fate of the Emperor will be shared by his chief officers.

But a sudden case of perplexity has arisen to-night, and affords almost the only faint hope of the Emperor's life being spared. Notice has been served upon the President that Maximilian denies the jurisdiction of the court, on grounds of international law. I am a government, he says, recognized by every power in the world except the United States, and I can only be tried by a legal congress of nations. Wheaton's work on International Law was at once in requisition; but there was only one copy in the whole of San Luis Potosi, and that belonged to a shrewd notary, who got his own price for it before he would give it up. Wheaton obtained, the Ministry have been in deliberation the whole night, and the council has not even now (midnight) broken up. What the result will be no one ventures to predict.

President Juarez is unquestionably in dilemma. The newspapers and all the violent liberals are clamoring loudly for Maximilian's blood. All the crimes and outrages of the French troops in this vicinity—and they are legion—are charged upon his head.

On the other hand, if the President orders Maximilian's execution, he has been warned that he would lose the sympathy of the United States. Personally Juarez would like to conciliate the United States; but the anti-American feeling has grown so strong here, especially since the unexpected fall of Queretaro, that it is quite possible Maximilian may be shot out of mere bravado towards the United States.

Interesting from Mexico—Maximilian's Proclamation.

GALVESTON, June 10.—We have news from Mexico to June 2. Miramon was still dangerously ill of his wound. Mendez was executed by order of Escobedo on the 16th ult. Campos was shot a few hours after the amputation of his leg.

When Maximilian gave up his sword to Escobedo, he said: "I surrender to you my sword owing to an infamous treason, without which to-morrow's sun would have seen yours in my hands."

Escobedo ordered a court martial to assemble and the 23th May, for the trial of the Emperor.

Maximilian sent, through Gen. Diaz, a telegram to the Prussian Minister at the city of Mexico, calling on him together with Miramon Riva Palacio and the Licentiate Martinez de la Torre, to defend him.

The official list of officers made prisoners at Queretaro is as follows: The Emperor Ferdinand Maximilian, Gens. Miguel Miramon, Thomas Mejia, Severo Del Castillo, Francisco G. Casanova, Jose de Herrera, Lozada Peliceros, Jose Maria Magana, Mariana Reyes, Pantaleon Moret Mariano, Monterde, Jesus Maria Cuervo, Pedro Valdez, Manuel Escobedo and Silyerito Ramirez; total, 14, colonels, 18; lieutenants, 16; majors, 36; captains, 114; lieutenants, 116; 2d lieutenants, 108; total, 437.

EVERY SATURDAY:
A Journal of Choice Reading, Selected From Foreign Current Literature.

This popular Weekly reproduces promptly for American readers the best and most readable portions of European periodicals. These embrace Serial Tales, Short Stories, Essays, Biographical and Descriptive, Poems, Sketches of Travel and Adventure, Literary Intelligence, and popular papers on Science, Translations from the admirable French Periodicals are a prominent feature.

Among the Periodicals from which selections are frequently made are: Once a Week, Chambers Journal, All the Year Round, The Spectator, The Reader, The Athenaeum, The Examiner, The London Saturday Review, and the Fortnightly Review; Fraser's, Blackwood's, Macmillan's, the Victorian, Argosy, New Monthly, and London Society Magazines; Revue des Deux Mondes, L'Evénement, Le Soleil.

Among the authors represented in Every Saturday are any of the wisest and wisest writers of Europe, as Henry King, Anthony Trollope, Matthew Arnold, Charles Kingsley, Edmund Yates, Frances Power Cobbe, Christina G. Rossetti, Anthony Trollope, George Sand, Edmund About, Alexandre Dumas, Mesdames de La Fayette, Madame de Staël, A. C. Cuvillier-Fleury, Robert Buchanan, Jean Ingelow, and Miss Thackeray.

Every Saturday is intended for Town and Country, for the Family, the Student, the Traveller, and the Seaman. The Publishers will be glad to comment it to all classes of cultivated and intelligent readers for the freshness and variety of its contents.

Every Saturday contains weekly 40 double-column large octavo pages.

TERMS:—Single Number, 10 cents; Yearly Subscription, $5.00 in advance; $1.00 per year in advance for any other periodical published by Ticknor and Fields. Monthly Parts, 50 cents a number. Yearly subscription, same as for Weekly Part.

For particulars, see accompanying Envelope with each bottle.
For sale at 59 Camp street, New Orleans,
THOS. K. PRICE, Vendor.

Read the following opinions of some of our old and well known citizens of
PRICE'S PATENT TEXAS TONIC,
Or, Vegetable Medicine.

T. K. PRICE, Esq., Vendor of "Price's Patent Texas Tonic," or Vegetable Medicine:
Dear Sir—After a fair and deliberate use and experiment of your Vegetable Tonic, known as PRICE'S PATENT TEXAS TONIC, we give it as our decided opinion, that it is the best remedy that we have ever known, for Indigestion, Torpor of the Liver, Constipation of the Bowels and Dyspepsia. We consider your Vegetable Medicine worthy of all commendation, and therefore feel no hesitation in recommending its use to our friends, as well as the public at large, and that, in doing so, we are contributing to all the afflicted. Many of us have been suffering from these evils from ten to fifteen years, and have been greatly benefited.

Wishing you great success in introducing this valuable medicine,
We remain yours truly,

Is one of the most necessary and desirable articles of household economy, and if properly managed, will promote the health, comfort, and happiness of every member of the family.
The money and extra time, by delay of your daily meals, may be saved by using the
CHARTER OAK COOKING STOVE.

Over 10,000 of these celebrated cooking stoves are in daily use throughout the city of New Orleans. Every one of them has been sold under a full guarantee, and we offer them as a reference wherever you find.

The Improved Charter Oak Stove with Extension Top
has but one damper, and is so simple in its construction that a child can manage it. The oven is larger, bakes more uniform, and the stove heavier than any cooking stove of corresponding size ever made.

The Hot Water Reservoir Boiler furnishes a constant supply of hot water at all hours of the day, and for hours after the fire has been extinguished, without additional cost for fuel, a practical illustration of the economy in using the Charter Oak.

The Reflector Griddle, original with the Charter Oak, and used on no other stove—the most perfect manner to boil meats and poultry, whereby the delicious odors arising from meats during the process of broiling are carried up the pipe, and juices of the meats preserved.

The Hot Closet, in which meats and poultry are kept warm for hours when there has been a delay at meals, besides enabling the cook to furnish the greatest variety of dishes and desserts, and place them hot upon the table.

The Charter Oak Stove will use one-third more baking in a given time, and use 25 per cent. less wood than any stove now made.

RANDOLPH MACON COLLEGE, VA., IN FULL OPERATIONS.
THIS TIME HONORED INSTITUTION IS once more in successful operation, with a FULL CORPS OF PROFESSORS. The chairs of the several sciences are filled by able and experienced men. There are five literary and scientific schools, viz: OF ANCIENT LANGUAGES, CHEMISTRY AND NATURAL PHILOSOPHY, MORAL PHILOSOPHY AND MODERN LANGUAGES. In addition to the above the Board of Trustees have established a school of COMMERICAL SCIENCE, with a view of giving to the young men of the country a BUSINESS EDUCATION.

To graduates in all these schools, Diplomas are granted and the degree of Bachelor of Arts and Master of Arts are conferred upon students who accomplish a certain course. The high grade of scholarship formerly required is still maintained. We have a full CHEMICAL and PHILOSOPHICAL APPARATUS for the illustration of the subjects taught.

The location of the College is unsurpassed for health and geniality. It is situated midway between the mountains and the seaboard, and during a career of thirty-three years, and with thousands of young men in attendance, there has never been a death arising from malaria or other local cause. We propose to educate a young man not only mentally but physically also.

BOARD IS SIXTEEN DOLLARS PER MONTH. Tuition from $40 to $80, according to the number of schools attended. $250 will cover expenses of board, tickets for three schools, matriculation and contingent fees for ten months.

Residence in the college free of charge, but the student provides his own furniture, fuel and lights. Young men who are preparing for the ministry and those disabled by the late war who are unable to pay their tuition, will be allowed to attend any or all of the schools free of charge.

This College is situated near Bordent, the county seat of Mecklenburg county, Va. Arrangements are made to transport students from Ridgeway Depot, on the Raleigh and Weldon Railroad, whilst a conveyance leaves Weldon station, on the Richmond and Danville Railroad, on Mondays, Wednesdays and Fridays, and the Wolf Trap Depot, on the same road, Tuesdays, Thursdays and Saturdays.

We solicit a liberal patronage from Maryland, Virginia and North Carolina, from the West, South and South-west.

Students will be received at any time. The second term will commence on the 6th day of February next. Young men will be received and prepared for the College proper. For further particulars address the undersigned at Bordent, Mecklenburg county, Va.

THOS. C. JOHNSON,
President R. M. College.

NEW ORLEANS MARKETS.

From the N. O. Price Current.

The business of the week has opened with a lively demand for our leading staple, the sales of which have been to a liberal extent, in proportion to the supply on sale. The movement in Tobacco, also, has been on an enlarged scale, at firm prices, but most other branches of trade have exhibited continued dullness, and Flour, Corn, Oats and Pork have sold at lower figures, particularly Corn, in which there has been a heavy decline, the supplies on the levee materially exceeding the demand.

COTTON.—The sales have been to quite a liberal extent, compared with the amount offering. On Saturday the movement was sensibly restricted by the limited supplies of the descriptions most in request, but still the sales summed up 2400 bales. On Monday, notwithstanding more stringent pretensions on the part of factors, and a general complaint among buyers of the poor supply offering, fully 3600 bales changed hands, at figures showing a slight advantage on the side of the factor, particularly in the Good Ordinary and Low Middling grades. Tuesday buyers again came forward with a fair degree of spirit, but the movement being checked by the same causes which had previously restricted it, particularly by the moderate extent of the offerings and the stringent pretensions of factors, the business was confined to 2500 bales, at firm prices, the partial improvement realized on Monday being fully maintained.

This makes an aggregate for the past three days of 8500 bales, taken partly for the North, but mostly for foreign export.

The receipts proper since Friday evening comprise 1311 bales, against 1350 during the corresponding period last week, showing an increase of 39 bales.

The receipts at this port, since the 1st of September, (exclusive of the arrivals from Mobile, Florida and Texas), are 699,370 bales, against 657,128 bales to same date last year, and the decrease in the receipts at all the ports, up to the latest dates, as compared with last year, is 143,433 bales. In the exports from the United States to foreign countries, as compared with the same dates last year, there is a decrease of 64,817 bales to Great Britain, of 24,214 to France, and an increase of 38,608 bales to other foreign ports.

TOBACCO.—The stock on sale is not large. A very active enquiry has prevailed since our last review, and there were sales of 525 hogheads. The market is firm and we continue to quote:

WHEAT.—The market continues extremely dull, and prices are too irregular for accurate quotations. The business doing is only in a jobbing way, and the sales have been about 4,000 bbls, in small lots, at prices within the range of our quotations.

MONETARY.

We have no material change to notice in the Money market proper, which continues extremely dull, with very little capital offering unless on first class signatures. Occasional negotiations of mortgage paper are effected at 9 to 12 per cent. per annum. Gold has continued quiet, with little or no speculative demand, but with increased rates caused by the tenor of New York accounts. The closing rates were 137 1/2 to 137 3/4.

The Stock market has continued extremely dull, with no speculative enquiry, and but little disposition to force sales at a sacrifice. We have, consequently, no transactions to notice. Quotations are mostly nominal.

EXCHANGE.—The increased movement in Cotton has materially added to the supply of Foreign Exchange, but without causing any falling off in rates, which have, in fact, improved under the advance in the New York gold market.

CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE

ORGAN OF THE M. E. CHURCH SOUTH FOR THE MOBILE, MONTGOMERY, MISSISSIPPI AND LOUISIANA CONFERENCES.

VOLUME XLII—NUMBER 24
WHOLE NUMBER 633.

NEW ORLEANS, SATURDAY, JUNE 29, 1867.

($3.00 A YEAR IN ADVANCE.
OFFICE—115 CAMP STREET.)

THE HEAVENLY SECRET.
Close at hand,
Stretch so wide—
The homeward rolling tide
Over which have crossed
Our loved and early lost,
That their unclouded eyes may never see
The further side,
Where still amid this toll and misery
We bide?
In the realm of their transition
Close at hand,
To this, our living land?
Near than we dream?
Can they catch the gleam
Of smiles, and hear the words we speak?
Can they see our needs?
Can they look deeper than our eyes may seek
Our deeds?
Do they mingle in our gladness?
Do they grieve
When ways of good we leave?
Do they know each thought and hope,
While we in shadows grope?
Can they hear the Future's high behest,
Yet lack the power
To lead us from our ill, or to arrest
The hour?
When they find us bowed in sorrow,
Do they sigh?
When the earth passes by
In silence, do they forget
The cares that here beset
Their well-beloved? Or do they wait
(Oh be it true!)
And watch beside the golden gate
For us?
We are yearning for their secret,
Though we call,
No answers ever fall
Upon our doted ears,
To quell our nameless fears.
Oh God is over all, whatever may be,
And trusting so,
Grieve, my heart! a little while; and we Shall know.

Marriage and Marriages.
The most romantic things in life happen in the direction of marriage. How wonderful it is that two persons born in different lands and reared up under widely varied circumstances,
unexpectedly to themselves,
fall into each others company,
in a few weeks, or days, and determine their fortunes and desti-
nity for life.
Sometimes such instances may be met with, but I must think,
as a rule, that such proceedings
are rash, precipitate, and perilous.
A man will hardly form a business partnership upon a few days or weeks acquaintance and without a knowledge of his partner's character. He will want to know if he is a reliable, truthful, agreeable man, and the like.
How much more intimate and important relation, involving our entire future for weal or woe, we find examples of the most inconsiderate precipitancy. I knew a man of a respectable and able young man who went on invitation to dine and spend the night at a stranger's house in a very strange community.—
There a niece of his host,
was in her company more or less during the evening—and because of a bed-time was engaged to be married to her. In two weeks afterward, which was next time he was in that neighborhood, and the next time he saw they were indissolubly united in marriage. Now I must think that a cook for a month, without making more inquiry, and knowing better what he was about,
young ladies sometimes think of rising above the common realities of every-day life,
to something extra and eccentric in the matter of marriage. It is not to love and wed some young man, the son of his father's neighbor. No, no—
it is too prosy—it would excite particular surprise, and be no days wonder. Some youth after—if of foreign birth all better—and if he sports a fortune, then perfection's light is attained. I will just say what I once said elsewhere,

what I think of such ideas. Once upon a time a young foreigner,
who made vast pretensions—he was an elegant fellow—called to see me, and mentioned that perhaps I was aware he was paying special attentions to an estimable young lady of my acquaintance—and that I would be called on to give my opinion as to the propiety of the contemplated union. I told him I presumed I would not be consulted—that we did not do things in that way in this country
—and that the relation I sustained did not authorize me to give any opinion in regard to the matter.
He insisted, however, that I would be called on—and as this would be the case, he wished to know what I thought of it. I told him it was none of my affair, and that I must decline saying anything about it. He, however, persisted in asking and hearing my views of the matter. I told him, abstracted from all connection with this particular case, that I would never consent to a sister, or daughter of mine marrying a man born in a foreign land, whom I had known but a little while, and about whose antecedents I knew nothing, and could know nothing.
He might be honorable and estimable—but he might be dishon-orably connected—might be a refugee from justice—might be an escaped convict—that the risk was too great—that I never could advise favorably, but must always oppose such a marriage. The results of this case vindicated my views. I entertain these opinions
now. I can conceive of no greater folly than to risk the happiness of a life for the mere vanity of doing a romantic and talk provoking thing.
How beautiful is the ordination
of God, who has "set the solitary in families"—that unites in an in-dissoluble bond two fond true hearts
—making their names, characters,
fortunes, and happiness one.
Marriage is as the confluence
and union of streams whose waters have met, mingled, and united flow to the ocean as one; or as two dew-drops on the same rose-leaf, mutually attracted, have united,
and are one until exhaled to heaven.

LEVEES AND OVERFLOWS.
Mr. Editor:—The battle of ink (not Inkerman), which has recently occurred between the reigning powers of Louisiana, suggests a new train of thought to your sep-tuanagarian friend "Refugee" on the subject of levees and overflows, and superinduces a review of the theories that have been propounded by those most competent to judge in matters involving so many facts of practical and common-sense engineering.
I think that our government officials instead of producing, or rather reproducing, the memorable tragedy of Kilkenny, would do well to reflect whether it would not be better to cancel obligations already incurred, than to squabble
about the disbursement of millions
not yet, nor likely to be, realized.
All, or nearly all, the money that has been wrung from the people
for that purpose, has been wasted
by incompetent engineering, or absorbed by bibulous officials. Our disasters have increased with the increase of appropriations until both have become absolutely frivolous. No wonder the people in the hills are beginning to enquire, with so much significance,
how long they are to be burdened to supply such useless waste. It is hard enough for them to be taxed to secure those who choose to settle where they know they would be overflowed, but it is too bad that they should be denied the comfort of knowing that they had labored for another's good.

In a previous article on the subject of levees and overflows, I satisfied myself at least that the experiment was a failure, and that every future effort to restrain the flood of our mighty river would but increase the disaster.
One other plan has been suggested, but it is only possible in theory—the revenue of an empire
would be insufficient to reduce it to practice.
When the Babylonians, after a struggle of centuries, failed to control the floods of the Euphrates
by levees, from causes similar to those which have baffled our skill and defied our power, they conceived and executed a system of dams and sluices on a scale so gi-gantic that after the lapse of thirty centuries, the traveler beholds
with amazement the vastness of their ruins—huge embankments,
excavated from artificial rivers,
traversing the plain of ancient Mesopotamia of such extent that both extremities pass beyond the field of vision.
Mr. Layard tells us that the traveler, in crossing the plain, sees for hours in advance those huge embankments rising before him like a distant mountain chain on the horizon. These artificial channels were not mere ditches—they were veritable channels of commerce, adorned with cities, and palaces, and temples throughout their course, the ruins of which still attest their former magnificence; and buried deep in the drift of ages are still to be found remains of the appliances of ancient commerce.
But we are told (by whom I do not now recollect) that when all these mighty works were found inadequate, it was observed that the annual flood did not take place in the Euphrates and Tigris at the same time. The idea was conceived of opening a connection between the two rivers, so that the surplus water of one river would flow into the vacant channel of the other, and thus give reciprocal relief. But it must be remembered that these were the achievements of absolute despotism, when the will of a single man could command the labor of millions and the wealth of empires.
I have chosen the Euphrates to illustrate my subject because of the similarity of its physical and geological features to those of the Mississippi, and of the historical and monumental evidence it furnishes of the labor and genius of the ancients to control or modify the physical laws by which it was governed.
In topographical surroundings
the two great rivers differ as much as they resemble each other in physical economy. While the Euphrates seems to have taken its course through a natural valley with shelving banks, and gradually elevated and extended its alluvial banks by a deposit of sediment on the primitive surface, the Mississippi plunged at once into the sea (perhaps at Cairo), and built up the walls of its own channel in the midst of the waters
as it advanced toward its present terminus. Nor will the process cease until the banks of the Mississippi touch the Gulf stream, and the material is swept on to the Bahamas.
The unfinished state of the country bordering on the lower portion of the river, indicates most clearly the process by which the higher and firmer portions have been formed, and were the sediment now deposited between the levees permitted to be diffused

over the surface as heretofore,
those lakes and swamps, in the roll
of ages would disappear to be reproduced in the Gulf of Mexico.
A remedy has been suggested for the defects of our present system, which on paper is full of hope, and but for the slight difference between theory and practicality would justify the experiment. The theory of creating lateral avenues of escape for the surplus water, and at the same time secure the interior, is perfectly feasible in theory, but in practice a work so gigantic that a million of Titans could not accomplish it in an age.
When the Atchafalaya, the Satinash, the Fardoch, the Gros Tete, the Manchac, the Plaque-mine, Bayou Goula, New River and Lafourche were all open, and some of them navigable rivers,
the Mississippi still overflowed its banks so that levees were necessary to protect the highest lands of the planter. But suppose other and greater rivers were opened so as to depress the Mississippi to any given standard, the want of escape from the great reservoirs
into which they flow would overwhelm the whole interior valley.
Suppose a river were opened into lake Pontchartrain without enlarging the avenues of egress, it would require an immense dyke
in the rear of the City to preserve
it from inundation, and all the water from rains and transpiration
would have to be removed by machinery. Even now, with all the constraining force of art and labor, the backwater is the greatest difficulty the interior planter has to contend with.
I know we are told that the canal system has saved the Egyptian
Delta, and we are asked why it would not be appropriate here.—
We answer, partly for reasons already given, but mainly because the same meteorological and physical agencies which buried the foundations of ancient Thebes and the base of the Pyramids deep in dust, has contributed with equal liberality to the surface of the Delta of the Nile, and has done
what the Mississippi would do for its own delta if let alone. Here we have no sinroom to bear on its burning wings material for filling up lakes and swamps, burying cities, or elevating fields.
In commencing this article, I had thought of making some comments on a long article copied by the Advocate from some other paper on the subject of the Mississippi, but as it presents but few points of controversy or relevancy, and is only valuable for its historical and statistical facts relative to the reclamation of land from the dominion of the sea by the science and labor of man, and is characterized both by research and perspicuity, I shall leave it to its own merits.
Our wide, deep, turbid, turbulent, and ceaselessly changing river
is without rival or similitude, (except in a few points), and has no equal upon the face of the earth, as a high way of commerce and contributor to the subsistence
and wealth of the world.
REFUGEE.

The American Bible Society,
since its first organization, has published, in its own and foreign languages, more than twenty-two and a half millions of volumes. Its receipts last year reached nearly $750,000.
It is estimated that the present
wheat crop in Georgia will yield 10,000,000 bushels.

THE ARCTIC NIGHT.
January 20th.
The morn is coming!
A faint twilight flush mounted
the southern sky to-day at the meridian hour, and, although barely perceptible, it was a cheering sight
to all of us.
At our usual Sunday gathering,
I read from Ecclesiastes these lines:—
"Truly the light is sweet, and a pleasant
thing it is for the eye to behold the sun."
And this suggested the text for our evening conversation; and we talked long of the future and of what was to be done, with the coming again of the god of day.
We all feel now that the veil of night is lifting, that the cloud is passing away, that the heavy load
of darkness is being lightened.—
The people have exhausted their means of amusement; the newspaper has died a natural death; theatricals are impossible; and there is nothing new to break the weariness of the long hours.
But we shall soon have no need to give thought to these things.—
There will be ere long neither time nor occasion for amusements.
The Arctic night will soon be numbered with the things of the past. We are eager that it shall have an end, and we long for the day and work.
And say what you will, talk as you will of pluck, and manly resolution, and mental resources, and all that sort of thing, this Arctic night is a severe ordeal. Physically one can get through it well enough. We are and always have been in perfect health. I am my own "ship's doctor," and am a doctor without a patient. Believing in Democritus rather than Heraclitus, we have laughed the scurvy and all other sources of ill-health to shame. And we have laughed at the scurvy really and truly; for if it does sometimes come in, like a thief in the night,
with salt rations and insufficient
food, which has not been our portion, it does, too, come with dependency and the splenetic blood of an unhappy household, from which we have fortunately been exempt.
But if the Arctic night can be endured with little strain upon the physical, it is, nevertheless, a severe trial both to the moral and the intellectual faculties. The darkness which so long clothes Nature unfolds to the senses a new world, and the senses accommodate themselves to that world
but poorly. The cheering influences of the rising sun which invite to labor; the soothing influences of the evening twilight which invite to repose; the change from day to night and from night to day which lightens the burden to the weary mind and the aching body,
strengthening the hope and sustaining the courage, in the great life-battle of the dear home-land,
is withdrawn, and in the constant longing for Light, Light, the mind and body, weary with the changeless progress of the time, fail to find repose where all is Rest.—
The grandeur of Nature ceases to give delight to the dulled sympathies. The heart longs continually for new associations, new objects, and new companionships.—
The dark and drear solitude op-presses the understanding; the desolation which every where reigns haunts the imagination;
the silence—dark, dreary, and profound—becomes a terror.
And yet there is in the Arctic night much that is attractive to the lover of Nature. There is in the flashing Aurora, in the play of the moonlight upon the hills and icebergs, in the broad expanse of the ice-fields, in the lofty grandeur of the mountains and the glaciers, in the naked fierceness of the storms,
much that is both sublime and beautiful. But they speak a language of their own—a language
rough, rugged and severe.
Nature is here exposed on a gi-gantic scale. Out of the glassy sea the cliffs rear their dark fronts
and frown grimly over the desolate waste of ice-clad waters. The mountain peaks, glittering in the clear cold atmosphere, pierce the very heavens, their heads hoary with unnumbered ages. The glaciers pour their crystal torrents
into the sea in floods of immeasurable magnitude. The very air, disdaining the gentle softness of other climes, bodies forth a loftier majesty, and seems to fill the universe with a boundless transparency; and the stars pierce it sharply, and the moon fills it with a cold refulgence. There is neither warmth nor coloring underneath this ethereal robe of night.

No broad window opens in the east, no gold and crimson curtain falls in the west, upon a world clothed in blue and green and purple, melting into one harmonious whole, a tinted cloak of graceful loveliness. Under the shadow of the eternal night, Nature needs no adornment. The glassy sea, the tall cliff, the lofty mountain, the majestic glacier, do not blend one with the other. Each stands forth alone, clothed only with Solitude.
Sable priestess of the Arctic winter, she has wrapped the world in a winding-sheet, and thrown her web and wool over the very face of Nature.
And I have gone out often into the Arctic night, and viewed Nature under varied aspects. I have rejoiced with her in her strength,
and commended with her in repose.
I have seen the wild burst of her anger, have watched her sportive play, and have beheld her robed
in silence. I have walked abroad in the darkness when the winds were roaring through the hills and crashing over the plain. I have strolled along the beach when the only sound that broke the stillness
was the dull creaking of the ice-tables, as they rose and fell lazily with the tide. I have wandered far out upon the frozen sea, and listened to the voice of the icebergs bewailing their imprisonment; along the glacier, where forms and falls the avalanche; upon the hill-top, where the drifting
snow, coursing over the rocks,
sang its plaintive song; and again
I have wandered away to some distant valley where all these sounds were hushed, and the air
was still and solemn as the tomb.
And it is here that the Arctic night is most impressive, where its true spirit is revealed, where its wonders are unloosed to sport
and play with the mind's vague imaginings. The heavens above and the earth beneath reveal only an endless and fathomless quiet.
There is nowhere around us evidence of life or motion. I stand alone in the midst of the mighty hills. Their tall crests climb upward, and are lost in the gray vault of the skies. The dark cliffs, standing against their slopes of white, are the steps of a vast amphitheatre. The mind, finding no rest on their bald summits, wanders into space. The moon, weary with long vigil, sinks to her repose. The Pleiades no longer breathe their sweet influences.—
Cassiopea and Andromeda and Orion and all the infinite host of unnumbered constellations, fail to infuse one spark of joy into this dead atmosphere. They have lost all their tenderness, and are cold and pulseless. The eye leaves them and returns to earth, and the trembling ear awaits something that will break the oppressive stillness. But no footfall of living thing reaches it; no wild beast howls through the solitude. There is no cry of bird to enliven the scene; no tree, among whose branches the winds can sigh and moan. The pulsations of my own heart are alone heard in the great void; and as the blood courses
through the sensitive organization of the ear, I am oppressed as with discordant sounds. Silence has ceased to be negative. It has become endowed with positive attributes. I seem to hear and see and feel it. It stands forth as a frightful spectre, filling the mind with the overpowering consciousness of universal death,—proclaiming the end of all things, and heralding
the everlasting future. Its presence is unendurable. I spring from the rock upon which I have been seated, I plant my feet heavily in the snow to banish its awful presence,—and the sound rolls
through the night and drives away
the phantom.
I have seen no expression on the face of Nature so filled with terror as the Silence of the Arctic Night.
Great men rise high above misery, as the eagle floats above the Chimborazo.
Discretion in speech is greater
and better than eloquence.

CAMDEN DISTRICT MEETING.

MONROVIE, ALA., June 15, 1867.

A District Meeting for the Camden District, Montgomery Conference, was held in Camden, commencing June 7th. Bishop Wightman was present and presided. All the pastors in the district were present, except one. Fifteen laymen were in attendance.

There was no special or remarkable manifestation of interest, but the pleasant interchange and friendly greeting of the preachers and people, together with the visit of the Bishop, made the occasion a pleasant and edifying one. We doubt not new resolutions for good were formed in many hearts. I send you condensed reports of the Committee on the State of the Church, and Church Finance, for publication in the Advocate. Interesting reports were made on Sunday-schools, and Relation of the Colored People to the Church, but as they were lengthy, and both these questions have been freely discussed, both in the papers and elsewhere, we thought it would be too great a draft on your columns to ask their publication.

The following were elected Lay Delegates to the next Annual Conference:

Rev. M. M. Graham, John Sampey, S. G. Jones, and J. B. Grace. W. B. DENNIS, Secretary.

REPORT ON CHURCH FINANCE.

After gathering all the information that could be elicited from the various pastoral charges, we find the finances of the church at a low ebb. Several causes exist to account for this. 1st. The sudden destruction of property by the disastrous revolution through which we have passed. 2d. Two successive years of blighting drouth have brought the country in many places to the verge of famine. And, lastly, the manifest distrust of God's Providence, and, we fear, a chafing dissatisfaction with the ways of that Providence, have retrenched the liberality of many toward the Church of God.

Some of the preachers have been compelled to depart from the maxim of our great founder—"Be a man of one work"—and have entered into secular employments to supplement an inadequate support. This is to be deeply regretted. The minister of Christ, to magnify his office and discharge its sacred functions, ought not to turn aside to secular employments. This mars the pulpit efforts, divides his mind, and impairs his usefulness.

We are glad, however, to say that the preachers are heroically enduring these privations, hoping and looking for a better day and more prosperous times. We are thankful to say that the prospect for an abundant crop is very encouraging, and should no disaster befall the growing crop, we have great hopes that the finances of the church will be better sustained.

Far from regarding it as an act of charity, we regard the providing a decent support for our ministers a solemn duty, the neglect of which nothing but a positive want of ability can extenuate.

We would most earnestly press this matter on the consideration of all our congregations, inasmuch as it involves the prosperity and perpetuity of the church.

We would earnestly recommend the example of the churches of Macedonia—"How that, in a great trial of affliction, the abundance of their joy and their deep poverty abounded unto the riches of their liberality."

We submit the following: Resolved, 1. That it is the duty of every pastor, as far as practicable, to devote his whole time to the work to which God has called him, visiting his people, especially the sick and the poor, in this way building up the waste places of Zion, and promoting gracious revivals of religion, which do more to produce large heartedness and liberality than any thing else.

Resolved, 2. That it is the solemn duty of every member of the church to contribute, according as God has prospered them, to the support of their pastors, who watch over their souls as they who must give an account, and to keep their minds and hearts from being burdened by any solicitude about the support of themselves or their families.

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE STATE OF THE CHURCH.

From all the information gained, it appears that there is a marked deficiency of vital piety. For this there is a cause—the sad neglect of the means of grace. The neglect of prayer—private, public, and social—the forsaking of our assemblies for christian council in the class-meeting and love-feast, the making attendance on public worship a matter of convenience, either of which would greatly weaken the religious energies, and when combined (as we fear they are in many cases) must result in death to piety even while we have a name to live.

The study of the Scriptures, and reading religious literature, are criminally neglected. Many plead in justification of such negligence the want of time—every hour must be devoted to business; and yet a careful reckoning will show that on an average from two to six hours a day are lost to business and spent in worse than idleness. Man requires relaxation from either mental or physical labor; but where can he find restoratives that act more promptly than the refreshings of the Holy Spirit? Fifteen, thirty, or sixty minutes spent in reading, meditation, and prayer will impart a vigor to the whole man, while it purifies the heart and elevates his moral nature.

It may be well to inquire whether the ministry have not contributed to this morbid piety. They are men of like passions as others, and share in the calamities that have swept over the country. They carry their dejection into the pulpit and to the fire-side, and their sermons are often as much the exponent of their gloom as they are of the text, and they conclude that the regular course of pastoral service does no good. The church—never rising in zeal or effort above the ministry—in perfect union of feeling, concludes that the preacher is doing but little.

Faith in God is the sad deficiency of the times in both preachers and people; and as it is written "without faith it is impossible to please Him," we may at one glance find a remedy for the wide-spread evils that affect the church and country.

Let us as preachers seek the renewal of high commission—not of the church, but of the Head of the church. Let us seek the baptism of the Holy Spirit, that He may take the sayings of Christ and make them known unto us, and with this preparation of moral and intellectual fitness let us offer ourselves to the Lord by solemn consecration, and as "ambassadors for Christ," persuade men to be reconciled to God.

In conclusion, we offer the following:

Resolved, 1. That as pastors of the church, we will give ourselves more earnestly to the ministry of the word, and to the edification of the Church of God.

Resolved, 2. That we will use all suitable efforts to induce our people to walk worthy of their high calling of God in Christ Jesus.

SOUL'S REST.—The needle's point in the seaman's compass never stands still, but quivers and shakes till it comes right against the North Pole. The wise men of the East never stood still till they were right against the star which appeared unto them, and the star itself never stood still till it came right against that other Star, which shone more brightly in the manger than the sun did in the firmament, and Noah's dove could find no rest for the sole of her foot, all the while she was fluttering over the flood, till she returned to the ark with an olive-branch in her mouth. So the heart of every true Christian, which is the turtle-dove of Jesus Christ, can find no rest all the while is he hovering over the waters of this world, till it have the silver wings of a dove, and, with the olive-branch of faith, fly to the true Noah, which signifieth "faith," till Christ put forth his hand out of the ark, and, taking it in, receive it to himself.

Methodist Protestant on the proposed Union.

The reception and mission of our Commissioners at the Montgomery Convention is thus described:

Early in the session the Convention received an agreeable visit, from Bishops Pierce and McTycire, L. M. Lee, D. D., and Rev. J. E. Evans, Commissioners of the M. E. Church, South. These brethren came at the instance of their General Conference, to submit a proposition to the Methodist Protestant Church, for a corporate union of the two organizations. They were courteously and cordially received, and a Commission composed of one ministerial, and one lay-representative from each Conference, appointed to confer with them. The result of the conference, has already been announced. The several interviews which took place between the respective Commissioners, were characterized on both sides, by the courtesy and candor due alike to themselves personally, and to the gravity of the subject, with which they were entrusted. But terms could not be agreed upon. It is probable that each party, found at the outset, that it had mistaken the other, in important respects. The other Commissioners supposed that, they having provided for lay-representation, in the General and Annual Conferences, no very material difference existed between the two churches. This, as they soon discovered, was an error. Their plan of lay-representation is objectionable. Unlike ours, it is not man for man; besides, it restricts the laity to a participation in one single subject of Conference deliberations; and furthermore, it is not a direct representation from the people. In addition to this dissimilarity in the two systems, quite a number of other and grave issues, were presented. So much for the misapprehension of our visitors. On the other hand, our Commissioners naturally inferred from the original overture, that the respected brethren with whom they were appointed to confer, possessed a greater degree of discretionary powers, in the premises. This was equally a mistake. The Bishops and their colleagues it seemed, were only authorized to announce that their Church, had adopted lay-representation, and upon that basis, alone, to offer us union. This the Convention was unwilling to accept. However, to allow both churches, time to duly consider the "disagreeing proposition," May, 1868, was named as the time when, if our Commissioners should judge it expedient, the Convention may again be called to renew the consideration of the subject.

Whether the Convention will be called, we can at present, express no intelligent opinion. The developments of Providence, must decide the question. We are quite sure, that the Conferences which are the most decided in their opposition; to the union on the basis proposed by the other Church, desire most sincerely to be controlled by the will of God. But, as at present advised, we are equally persuaded, that our sister Church will have to make other important changes in her economy, before she and our Church, can rally beneath the same ecclesiastical banner.

On the Episcopacy and the substance of Article IV, "To have as many Bishops as Annual Conferences," the Editor further says.

It may seem strange, and perhaps be considered inconsistent, that we should be willing to accept the Episcopacy, and to require as a condition of union, an increase of the number of bishops, seeing that as a Church, we have always opposed it. The Episcopacy, however, which we demand is a very different thing, from that of the M. E. Church. Our demand is a bishop for every Conference, not twenty or fifty for the whole; but one for each. As such he is to belong to that Conference, and to form a part of it; to travel through its territory and discharge the Episcopal functions therein, and to be supported by it. Denying, as the M. E. Church professes to do, the theory of an Episcopal order, and curtailing as we require, the jurisdiction of the bishops to the limits of an Annual Conference District, the office would to our people, lose its most objectionable features. It would resemble, in its essential features, or own president, with the two points of difference, that the bishop would be appointed, though not necessarily, by the General Conference, and that he would hold his office by a lifetime tenure. These points, I suppose our people would be willing to yield for the sake of union.

But to expect Methodist Protestants to accept the Episcopacy of the M. E. Church as it is, is to expect too much; and to say they have accepted, or are willing to accept it, is saying what is not warranted by the facts. They have been too long in the enjoyment of the full liberty of the children of God to do this; and they have not yet forgotten the nature of their mission. If, for a moment, any of them have supposed that their work was accomplished, and have been willing, with the form of lay-representation adopted by the M. E. Church South, to be merged in that denomination, it was in a moment of despondency or forgetfulness. A review of the grounds will show them that our work is not yet done.

To my mind, our work is but beginning to assume a more promising aspect. The labors and sacrifices we have endured for mutual rights, have already resulted in the adoption of the principal of lay-representation in the M. E. Church South. There are promising indications in the M. E. Church North; and before many years we may expect to see it fully engrafted on that sectional division of the Church. If success has thus followed our labors in this particular, may we not confidently hope that the other points of difficulty will be satisfactorily adjusted. The great point of difference now existing between the M. E. Church South, and our own is that heretofore discussed. Let that be adjusted, as doubtless it will be, whether a corporate union takes place between us or not, and presiding elders will become an unnecessary appendage and will be dispensed with. The heaven is in the lump, and is working. Let no one lose faith; and especially, let no one imagine that our labor is in vain, though we may not build up a strong and commanding denomination. If our principles are adopted, we are justified, and the judgment of condemnation by which we were expelled from the Church is itself condemned.

A NEW CONFERENCE.

We are indebted to the St. Louis Christian Advocate for the following statements and Bishop Doggett's report:

On the 8th, 9th, and 10th inst., Bishops Doggett and Marvin, by previous request, attended a Council of preachers and lay-representatives of the "Christian Union Church" in Illinois. The Council was held at Clinton, and after due and prayerful deliberation the following action was had: The Council, representing some twenty-five or thirty traveling, and many local preachers, with from three to five thousand members, resolved to organize under the style and title of "The Episcopal Methodist Church," to adopt, for the present, the Discipline, Hymn Book, literature, etc., of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, and ask our bishops to take Episcopal charge of them until the next General Conference of the M. E. Church, South, which will be held in May, 1870. All this was done in due form by the Council, or convention rather, with only one dissenting voice.

The following is the Bishop's report of the matter:

Dr. McANALLY.—Dear Brother: A convention of the Christian Union Churches of Illinois was held in the city of Clinton, in that State, on the 7th and 8th inst., at which I was present. The convention adopted the following resolutions and presented them to me:

"Resolved, by the Christian Union Church of the State of Illinois, in convention assembled, in the city of Clinton, Illinois, on the 8th day of June, 1867, That we do hereby assume, as the style and title of our organization, the name of Episcopal Methodist Church.

"Resolved, That this convention, under the said style and title, do hereby receive and adopt the doctrines and discipline of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, as the doctrines and discipline of said Episcopal Methodist Church.

"Resolved, That the Conference of said Church be styled the Illinois Conference of the Episcopal Methodist Church, and shall embrace within its boundary the State of Illinois.

"Resolved, That the bishops of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, be, and are hereby, invited to extend their jurisdiction over this Conference.

"Resolved, That Bishop Doggett being present, be, and is hereby, requested to extend said jurisdiction over us from this date."

The last General Conference adopted the following resolutions; see page 51 of the printed journal:

"Resolved, That in the interval of the General Conference, if any number of ministers representing a respectable number of churches and congregations, occupying territory not embraced within the prescribed boundaries of any of our Annual Conferences, shall signify and formally express a wish to unite with the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, and shall give satisfactory assurance that they heartily believe our Articles of Religion, and are cordially willing to be governed by our Discipline, our bishops may organize such district or territory into a Conference, which shall be recognized as one of the Annual Conferences of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, which shall be entitled to all the rights, privileges, and immunities of any other Annual Conference holding connection with said Church."

Having taken previous counsel and advice of Bishop Andrew, in view of the possibility of such a measure on the part of the Christian Union Church, and sustained by the full concurrence of Bishop Marvin, who was present with me, I entered the convention, was invited to take charge of them, and made the following public declaration:

To the resolutions which you have just adopted, a copy of which you have just presented to me, I make the following response:

The College of Bishops of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, at their recent meeting in the city of Nashville, Tenn., feeling a deep interest in the spiritual welfare of the Christian Union Church, in the State of Illinois, requested me, if practicable, to visit you during my episcopal tour in the West, and to express to you their cordial sympathy with you as a Christian communion identical with the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, in spirit, in doctrine, and in discipline. This pleasing duty I now hereby, in their name, fulfill.

Apprised of this request you have called a convention of your Church at this place, and since my arrival an important event has transpired in your history, by your own voluntary act and deed. You have assumed, as the style and title of your organization, the name Episcopal Methodist Church, expressly adopting the doctrines and discipline of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, in every particular, as now authorized by the General Conference of said Church, the name only excepted; and for the better accomplishment of your mission as a Church of Christ, you have requested me, as one of the bishops of said Church, to admit you into connection with, and under the jurisdiction of, said Church, from the present date. Having had this grave subject under solemn and prayerful consideration, and with, I trust, a just apprehension of the responsibilities involved;

Now, therefore, I, David S. Doggett, one of the Bishops of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, in the name of said Church, with an eye single to the glory of God, and with a view of "spreading scriptural holiness over these lands," do hereby admit the aforesaid Methodist Episcopal Church into the communion and under the jurisdiction of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, on the conditions specified in the foregoing resolutions, and with the rights and privileges of other Annual Conferences of said Methodist Episcopal Church, South, during the interval of the General Conference; this whole transaction, nevertheless, to be held subject to the revision and ratification of the next ensuing General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, appointed to meet in the city of Memphis, State of Tennessee, in the month of May, in the year of our Lord, 1870.

Done at Clinton, Illinois, June 8, 1867. D. S. DOGGETT.

ENOCH M. MARVIN, present and concurring.

They were accordingly taken under the charge of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, Nashville, Illinois, was selected as the place for the first regular session of their Conference, and I appointed the 16th of October next as the time for the meeting.

Affectionately, D. S. DOGGETT. St. Louis, June 12, 1867.

THE BEST RECOMMENDATION.—A youth seeking for a place came to New York city, and on inquiring at a counting-room if they wished a clerk, was told that they did not. He then spoke of the recommendation he had, one of which was from a highly respectable citizen. The merchant desired to see them. In turning over his carpet-bag to find his letters, a book rolled out on the floor.

"What book is that?" said the merchant.

"It is the Bible, sir," was the reply.

"And what are you going to do with that book in New York?"

The lad looked seriously into the merchant's face, and replied, "I promised my mother I would read it every day, and I shall do so."

The merchant at once took him into his service, and in due time he became a partner in the firm, one of the most respectable and prosperous in the city.

NAUGHTY WORDS. SICK.—Never say them, and never listen to them if you can help it. Said Charlie to one of his playmates, "I don't want to hear naughty words."

"It does not signify," answered the boy, "for they goin' at one ear and out at the other."

"No," replied Charlie, "the worst of it is, when naughty words get in their stick, so I mean to do my best to keep them out."

The Doctors and the 'Weed.'

"Doctor," we said, to a splendid specimen of the profession, "tell us something about the baneful effects of tobacco."

"Its effects, sir," he replied, "are evil and only evil, and that continually; and it is a perfect mystery that gentlemen of my profession care so little, do and know so little about a poison that is doing mischief at so terrible a rate."

"Sir," the doctor continued, "I was on a council of physicians the other day on the border of this town; the patient was a young man, prostrate by paralysis; he was deprived of the use of his lower limbs from the abdomen to the toe; we overhauled him; we withdrew and talked about antecedents and probable causes, and came to no satisfactory conclusions. Dissatisfied and impatient, I inquired of his attending physician whether the poor fellow used tobacco."

"O, no," he replied, "I guess not; and with an air of nonchalance, added, 'what if he does, that can have nothing to do with his case.' 'I did not ask you,' I replied, 'about the effects of tobacco, but simply if the patient used it.'"

"Gruffly he said, 'Go and see.' Stepping to his bedside, I said, 'My young friend, do you use tobacco?'"

With a squealing voice, more catlike than human, he answered: 'I use a little.'

"How do you use it?"

"I smoke a little."

"Did you smoke this morning?"

"Yes, a little."

"Did you smoke at noon?"

"Yes, a little."

Before I quit his side I ascertained that he had actually consumed sixteen cigars a day, and the poor fellow's soul was so obfuscated by smoke that he considered that prodigious amount but 'little'!

"This," continued the doctor, "may seem strange, but the strangest of all is the fact that his attending physician—regular and well-bred—did not know, in the first place, that his patient used tobacco—and, secondly, if he did, he did not know that a rank and deadly poison could have any thing to do with his case!"

We are indebted to the medical profession for the most effective testimony against this popular poison; hence we have no wish to arraign it and denounce it in whole-sale style. But account for it as we may, on the score of selfishness or ignorance, the main body of the profession are mournfully derelict in duty touching the ruinous effects of this great and fashionable narcotic.

ANECDOTES OF THE DUKE OF WELLINGTON.—Many people have an idea, that if they pay all that is asked for an article, they are honest. But it is a very inferior quality of honesty to say the least, that will beat the seller down below a fair price, or take advantage of a person's misfortune.

A striking instance is related as to the liberality of the old "Iron Duke." A needy farmer being compelled by necessity to advertise his little tract of land for sale, his grace's steward made an offer for it, which was accepted; and when the duke, a few days afterwards, arrived from town, the steward acquainted him with his judicious purchase, flattering himself that he should be praised at having bought the farm so cheap.

"Cheap, sir!" I want no man's land cheap. Let two proper persons be appointed immediately to survey and value the farm."

Greatest and sorely disappointed, the steward returned to fulfil the directions, and the next interview handed his grace the report of the surveyors; by which the land was valued at several hundred pounds beyond the price previously agreed upon. This the Duke immediately ordered to be paid to the farmer, adding: "I can better afford to pay a fair price than the farmer to take an unfair one; and bear in mind I want no man's land cheap."

PLEASED JESUS.—The Lord Jesus does not say "Get on," but "Follow me." He does not want us to do as well as other people, but as well as we can; and then he is quite sure to be pleased. He wills all his children to bring them their work every evening. Some of them have done things which will be talked about while the world lasts, and some have done what no one thinks anything of, perhaps cut the grass in the square garden, or borne a bad ankle patiently, or done a few lessons as well as they can. But God is quite pleased with one us with another. God sets us here not to do wonders, but to learn lessons. We are to do the wonders by and by.—Wm. H. Beeman.

PEACHES.—Hon. H. W. Ravenel, writing on Peach Culture from Aiken, S. C., says that in the last fifteen years there have been four total failures of the crop, six full and five partial crops in that vicinity.

The Paris Exposition

VIEWS OF A CHARTY FRENCH CORRESPONDENT.

The following from the pen of a clever French writer gives such a clear and interesting account of what is now the universal topic, that we have translated it expressly for the readers of the Sunday News. All other accounts of the exhibition since its opening, April 1, have been just about as clear as mud.

"The exhibition has wonderfully succeeded in spite of all hostile predictions. It is a peculiar trait of our character that while other nations have the spirit of solidarity, we have an itching for national fault finding. We are cutled vain, but we are a hundred times less so than other nations who disguise their defects and weaknesses, while we take pleasure in confessing and exaggerating ours.

Yes, French correspondents scattered broadcast their prognostications that the fair would be a failure. Yet, what is the fact? Never before has such a magnificent spectacle been presented to the eyes of the world. It is not only European; it is human. Nowhere else has man reared such a temple to humanity.

Here are eloquent figures. The World's Fair at London in 1851 comprised 16,000 exhibitors and covered 95,000 square yards of ground. The present one in Paris counts 42,217 exhibitors, and occupies the whole Champ-de-Mars, or 460,000 square yards of ground. True, only the center of this immense space is occupied by the palace, while the rest is laid off in a surrounding park, which is not the least interesting part of the vast pandemonium. On entering it, one is amazed at the number of buildings reared on all sides on this piece of ground, which last year was a naked, sandy plain. At first appears cafes, churches, an equestrian theater, gigantic light-houses which illumine the night as day, parks of English and French artillery, where our little rifled cannon contrast intentionally with colossal Armstrong guns (which look so terrible, but are so difficult to manage); sheets of water on which are row boats, workshops, fountains, and the imperial pavilion, constantly stared at by the throng. Beyond all this, the East spreads its wonders. "Mexicans," (are they an Eastern people, then?) "Egyptians, Turks, Africans, are there showing off their products and themselves to boot. The sovereigns of Japan and Siam have had buildings put up, too; and although the Emperor of China (perhaps the only abating sovereign) has sent nothing, yet there is a Chinese theater, whose actors are partly genuine Chinese, partly counterfeited.

The East is followed by Russia, offering charming specimens of stables, horses and peasant huts. Then comes a space allotted to the heavy articles of North Europe—Russian sleighs, German vehicles, and a harness for hitching dogs under carriages imported by the Prussians. (N. B. French and Prussians are on the best of terms) and an equestrian statue of King William I. Then in the left angle of the Champ, opposite the Ecole Militaire, appears a vast garden filled with the finest and rarest plants, flowers, vegetable, etc., artificial rocks, aquariums with all kinds of fish.

Let us go now under the palace, which has an elliptical form, as of a gigantic egg, and is divided in seven grand circles, or concentric avenues. Each of these is consecrated to the identical products of all nationalities. First, Works of art, sculpture, painting, etc. Second, The industrial arts represented by books, music, photography, gold ware and jewelry. Third, Furniture and crystals. Fourth, Clothes of all kinds. Fifth, Brute material indispensable to all kinds of industry. Sixth, Machines. The seventh and last circle is the exterior one, and is allotted to the feeding of visitors, to restaurants, cafes and buffets of each nation. To the French restaurants and lemonade mongers, who treat and refresh you at any price, succeed a series of not less endless English, American, Russian, Swedish, Norwegian, Danish, Austrian, Prussian, Bavarian, Dutch, and the English owe a large part of their success to a selection, very skillfully made, of a dozen young, pretty, and wide-awake counter girls. The Dutch draw, also, by means of two pretty counteresses. The Russians, too, wear their national costume, but it is less attractive than their dishes. The Bavarian taverus triumph by their beer, which all the Germans cram with delight while smoking their big pipes. The Americans frequent very assiduously the cafe restaurant of Dows, Guild, Clark and Van Winkle of Boston, who have united to make as know what they call "American dishes" and soda water. As to the foaming and unfamous wines of the United States, of which many specimens are offered, very few people venture to drink them. "The Americans themselves like better to drink something else." [What's the matter with our wines? Surely they're not enough whisky in them.] "But let us go out of this circle of our material wants, far more impetuous than our moral wants, to judge by the place they occupy. We enter the circle of machines. All kinds of implements—engines are functioning, wheels turning, hammers knocking, saws screeching. It is stunning. Here everything is made before the public; England, France, Germany, and the United States, the four grand industrial centers of the world, maintain valiantly the struggle in this arena; where the women fight by the side of men. Here can be made 45,000 pianos a day; here they will put you up a cabinet in 45 minutes, or pair of shoes, or boots in half an hour, or five cotton socks (at 3fr. 50c. the dozen.) in a twinkling!

But it is in articles of taste that the supremacy of France is marked; in silks, robes, lace, furniture, jewels, bronzes, crystals, paintings; we are without rivals. Passing from the show and robes for the masses, people flock to see the show of dolls, each more charming, and luxurious than the other. They bower themselves three times longer than themselves, longous upon the nose, and play the fun in saloons filled with miniature; it is like a fairy tale. In another room are displayed the different costumes of our provinces.

After the French department, the largest and finest is the English. Its silverware and jewelry are almost as rich as ours, but more massive and of a less delicate taste. Their furniture, crystals and porcelain are more remarkable. Austria comes in third order, and bears the palm over Germany. To her Bohemian crystals, however, Saxony opposes its porcelains. Belgium shines by her lace, and Switzerland by embroidery. Russia astonishes by her progress. Italy holds a distinguished place with her sculptures, mosaics from Florence and jewels from Rome. Spain sustains her old reputation against her young rivals, Portugal and Brazil. The Republics of South America and the Sandwich Islands are represented not only by their productions, but by types of their races. From South America we pass to North America, which resembles it so little. The contrast is striking. Here the English genius reappears with its character of positive utility, but with peculiar inspirations, bearing the stamp of youth and audacity.

All the doors are shut at six; but the gardens are open till midnight, and are the rendezvous of a new class of our population, which come to take their leisure, and its frolics by gaslight, making the palace appear almost enchanted. Silences abound, but this danger is perhaps all so its attraction. The increase in the prices of living at Paris has been but slight; and is still far beneath the rates of London, St. Petersburg and New York.

The Dangers of our Artificial Lights.

It is becoming a matter demanding legislative interference what shall be done to prevent the accidents so commonly occurring from the use of the common means for producing artificial light, or, at least, to diminish the danger. If a correct record could be presented of the catastrophes—the injuries to person and property—which have been caused by the use of gas, kerosene, camphene, and burning fluid the statistics would appal the reader.

Gas explosions are always the result of carelessness or thoughtlessness. It is probably the least dangerous agent for producing light since the relinquishment of whale and lard oil for this purpose, but the ignorance or the thoughtlessness of people make it sometimes a very dangerous substance. Confined in pipes it is perfectly safe. It cannot explode nor even burn until mixed with the oxygen of the atmosphere, and it has the valuable quality of denoting its presence when mingled with the air we breathe. In this form it is dangerous, yet when a meter or the pipes located in a vault or dark cellar leak, it is to common a practice to enter the room with a light to examine the leak, when of course an explosion takes place. This can be readily prevented by first ventilating the room through doors and windows. There can be no excuse for these accidents nor for the blowing out of a gas light leaving the pipe open for the escape of the gas, a trick usually ascribed to country visitors to cities, but not seldom performed by those who should know better. Cases of death by asphyxia in sleeping rooms from this inexcusable carelessness are not infrequent.

Camphene and burning fluid have been largely superseded by kerosene, yet they are still used to a limited extent, the fluid being burned by a wick in the ordinary manner or used to generate a gas in the lamp itself. In whatever manner employed these mixtures of alcohol and turpentine are dangerous, as many fatal accidents have proved. We know of no method of preventing the danger attending their use, and are glad they are going out of fashion. But it may be doubted whether in exchanging them for kerosene we are not "jumping from the frying pan into the fire."

Kerosene accidents are altogether too common. It would seem that this hydro-carbon might be made at least non-explosive; that it can be made non-inflammable is impossible without destroying its light-producing qualities. But many serious and fatal accidents are continually occurring by explosions of kerosene lamps. A low distillation of the oil would easily remove the more ethereal substances in its composition, which, at temperature not excessive, generate an explosive gas. There should be some simple means of testing kerosene to detect the presence of these volatile elements. Beyond that, only care in the use of kerosene promises to avert its dangers.

It is commonly burned in glass lamps. Now glass is one of the most unreliable substances known, and if not properly annealed will sometimes, even when untouched, fall in pieces as though shattered by a blow. Very likely many of the so-called explosions of kerosene lamps occur by the fracture of the glass lamp containing the oil. An eminent chemist tells us that a few days ago a glass bottle which he had used for years, and which contained collodion, suddenly shattered into fragments while standing on a table where it had remained untouched for weeks, and a flask that he had used for distilling benzine in a similar manner after it was laid aside.

The practice of blowing out the light when the flame is full, by throwing the breath down the chimney is pernicious. If the wick is loose in the tube the flame may be forced into the lamp and instantly ignite the surface gas or the oil itself. A better practice is to turn the flame down to a flicker and then blow it out. Lamps of metal would seem to be preferable to those made of so treacherous a material as glass, although they are not so elegant.

It is hardly credible that manufacturers or vendors of kerosene would willingly deal in a dangerous article containing explosive elements, as their reputation and consequent profits depend upon the quality of the fluid, but the presence of naphtha and benzine in much of it now sold is susceptible of proof. Legislative interference, aided by science, appears to be demanded as a protection to consumers; for it cannot be expected that the people at large are to become analytical chemists in order to judge of the quality of the oil they use. Either this, or we must go back to the use of the old fashioned oil lamp, the breaking of which is attended with no more serious consequences than the formation of a grease spot.

GLASS-MAKING.

The great perfection to which the art of glass-making has been carried within a short period, equalling the purest crystal in clearness, and almost rivaling the diamond in brilliancy, makes the history of the art highly interesting. The invention, like so many other arts that have come to us from ancient times, is attributed to the Phoenicians, although, in all probability, it was more strictly a discovery than an invention. Indeed, we are told by Pliny that the reported history of its first production was, that "the crew of a merchant ship laden with nitre, having used some pieces of it to support the kettles placed on the fires they had made on the sand, were surprised to see fragments formed of a translucent substance, or glass." In the time of this writer, glass was made in Italy of the fine sand so abundant upon the shore near Cumæ, and many articles of glass have been found in the ruins of Herculæum and Pompeii, and in the remains of other ancient cities.

Glass of all kinds is produced by the fusion by means of fire, of silicious earth with an alkali or metallic oxide; but there is a great variety in the manufacture, owing to the kinds of earth and alkali, and to the substances used for coloring and otherwise giving to it some accidental quality. Dr. Ure specifies five distinct kind of glass: 1, flint-glass, or glass lead; 2, plate-glass, or glass of pure soda; 3, crown-glass, the best window-glass; 4, broad glass, a coarse window-glass; 5, bottle, or coarse green glass. The first of these derives its name from the fact that pulverized lime was originally employed as the principal ingredient in making it. It is not only extensively used for domestic vessels of great purity and beauty, but it has special interest to scientific persons from its peculiar refracting power. It causes a greater dispersion of the rays of light when passing through a prism or lens formed of it than any other vitreous compound. This property renders it invaluable in the manufacture of the object-glasses of telescopes and microscopes, for, by combining a concave lens of flint-glass with one or two convex lenses of crown-glass, which has a much less dispersive power, a compound lens is formed free from prismatic colors, and the instrument rendered achromatic—an indispensable requisite in an optical instrument of strong power. The glass used in such instruments has a larger proportion of lead than that used for ordinary purposes, the lead increasing the dispersive power. Plate-glass is used chiefly for mirrors and for the large heavy panes in shop windows, and where heavy clear glass is required.

There is nothing connected with the manufacture of glass more wonderful than the effect of annealing, or, as it is called, nealing. Before this process taken, place, the glass is exceedingly brittle, vessels being liable to be broken into a thousand pieces by the slightest blow, and almost by a touch. A single grain of sand dropping into a glass vessel before the annealing has taken place, will sometimes shiver it into fragments. To prevent this, the glass is placed in a kind of oven or furnace, and subjected to great heat, after which it is suffered to cool very gradually, allowing all the parts to crystallize equally and perfectly. This gives to it, when thoroughly and carefully done, a marvelous toughness. This process has been carried to such an extent that the glass has become quite malleable, so as to be moulded into new shapes. But the ordinary effect is only to preserve it from fracture by slight causes. Colored glass, for window and other ornamental purposes, is becoming much more extensively manufactured within a few years than for centuries before. The art was carried to a great perfection in the middle ages, after which it declined, but its revival of late has been very marked. It is a matter in dispute whether moderns have been as successful as the ancients in its production, some contending that the compounding of the colors, and their transfer to the glass, is one of the lost arts. Our modern artists reject this idea, and we are compelled to acknowledge that there is nothing that has come down to us, in the cathedrals of a former age, that surpasses in beauty and brilliancy the colors of the windows that adorn many recent structures; but whether the latter will prove as permanent as the other, remains to be tested; and this is a point which must be left to future generations for settlement.—Journal of Commerce.

FARM AND GARDEN.

SMALLNESS OF COB VERY DESIRABLE IN SEED CORN.—The selection of seed corn is one of the most important things which a farmer does at this season. Coarse cobs accompany late maturity, as a rule: fine cobs, well tipped out, indicate perfect maturity, adaptation to the season and a fixedness of character which it is important to maintain. The curing of corn takes place to a great extent after husking, and the presence of a great, soft, moist cob in each ear gives a tendency to mold, which should be sedulously avoided. The old experiment of fitting a paper cone to an ear of corn and withdrawing the ear, shelling it and returning the kernels to the cone is interesting and instructive. If the kernels will all go easily into the cone, the cob is too large, and we should say the corn is unfit for seed. The cone should be made of brown paper, dampened, bound tightly around the ear, coming no higher than the kernel but covering all; the ends are trimmed off, and it is allowed to dry before the ear is drawn out. One may judge which ears have the smallest cobs—those which are best tipped out, which have the kernels in the closest rows and all the rows running unbroken from end to end. These ears will not be found among the biggest round, nor among the longest, usually, but among those of medium size. A friend used to say, as he showed off his seed corn, "they are as regular and solid as a brickbat." And so they were, for as corn ears could be broken, closed and solid.—American Agriculturist.

PURE WATER.—No water ought to be drunk which is contaminated by leakage or infiltration from sewers, cesspools, or from ditches. When possible, the water supplied in towns, or derived from surface wells, ought always to be filtered before use. A cheap filter can be made by taking a large common earthen flower pot plug the hole at the bottom (not too tight) with a piece of sponge, then strew the bottom of the pot with powdered charcoal one inch thick, over this put a layer of clean sand, over that again an equal quantity of coarse gravel and a few loose, small stones; now set over a jug or bottle and fill it up with water, the water which drops through the bottom will be found sweetened from its impurities and fit to drink. This filter is admirably adapted for use at sea, being easily made and kept in order. It is said that water from a stagnant pond may be sucked through charcoal with impunity.

BUTTER MAKING.—As to scalding milk, it does more harm than good, as it spoils the taste of the milk, and makes the butter white, and does not make the least difference about the butter coming quick. Now, the way to make butter good, at all times of the year, is very simple and easy. The first things are clean pans, pails and strainers; the next are clean butter bowls and churn. Never let the cream stand in the churn over ten minutes before it is churned, nor let the buttermilk stand in the churn after the butter is taken off. Never let the butter stand in the bowl over one night. Let the milk stand just long enough to have all the cream rise, which will be forty-eight hours at the longest, and not wait for the milk to thicken, as no cream will rise after the milk is sour; then as you skim your milk put it in clean stone vessels, and not cover tight, stirring lightly every time the cream is added, and the night before churning stir thoroughly till all is even, and never let it stand an hour after it is fit to be churned. If it is cold, add hot water gradually till of the right temperature. In winter have your pantry moderately warm. If it is too warm the cream will dry over, and the milk will sour before the cream is raised. If it is too cold by turns, and then warm, the cream will be bitter, and it will not rise as evenly as it will by keeping the room at an even temperature. If in a warmer day, or when there is more fire let the window be open, and all will be right. If these rules are followed, good butter at all times will be had. Never keep butter in a perfectly tight jar, or in a tin dish; but put it on a clean plate, and cover with a cloth; set it in a cool place if you don't want musty butter, and the no recolor air gets the better.

HOW TO PRESERVE BUTTER.—Prefer good white oak firkins that are perfectly brim-tight, take out the head, first making a small hole, say quarter of an inch in size, then fill it with cold water; let it stand twenty-four hours before you are ready to use it, then rub while wet, thoroughly, with fine salt; fill your firkin as soon as possible. Your firkins should be of such a size that one can be readily filled in a week or ten days with sweet butter, to within half an inch of the head, then place over it a clean cloth, and fill the space with coarse salt, put in the head, then fill with strong brine, previously made of course salt, and stop it up. Butter packed in this way and kept in a cool place, will be as sweet in one year as when first made.

COTTON.—The frosts of the early part of May destroyed cotton in low places, in many sections, and where not killed, the stand was a good deal injured by the cold, whereby late replanting, to some considerable extent, was made necessary, and therefore the labor of chopping out and reducing to a stand is later than ordinary. Thin it to a stand as early as the case admits, and the plant is large enough to be free from ordinary dangers. Give the crop the unremitting attention it now demands. Scrape and mold as needed, letting the earth be turned gently toward it by a careful plowman, keeping the ground in fine tilth at the surface. Be careful that the plants left for a stand are not bruised with the hoe, and use the hand when necessary, for bruised stalks soon die of the "sore shin." As the crop advances and the squares appear, be careful not to break the lateral roots, which will retard its progress. The idea is to keep the surface soft and clean, without disturbing the roots. Keep down the grass with scrapes and sweeps, instead of the plow.

HARVESTING WHEAT.—If rust appears in wheat cut it in the dough state and it will make sweeter, nicer flour and more of it. From the moment the rust strikes the grain date ripens. In very bad cases of rust, appearing early, obviously it is not worth saving for bread.

Let the grain intended for seed become fully ripe, but that for bread you can begin to cut in the dough stage. Let the "shocks" stay as long as possible in the field well "capped," and, when dry enough, stacked up in the most careful manner, or stored away under cover until you are ready to thresh it, and the sooner you get ready to thresh the less waste and damage will it sustain. At all events, it must be got out before the weevil appears. When threshed see that it is thoroughly sunned, and when perfectly dry put it up at midday in tight barrels and boxes and you will be able to keep it free from weevil, which you cannot do in this climate without it receives, before putting up, plenty of hot sun. Thus secured, it will keep sound two years.

SELECTING SEED.—As a preliminary to a good and prolific harvest, all grain seeds are furnished with oil and starch, which are designed to furnish nutriment to the germ when it first starts before becoming capable of extracting it from the soil. Now, if anything affects these, such as mold, etc., the plant that is supposed to grow from such seed will be influenced by the impurities of the seed when it is sown. There is more in this than is usually conceded by practice, and the farmers would derive benefit from greater care and discrimination in the seed they plant and sow.

THE INFLUENCE OF TOBACCO UPON OTHER FARM CROPS.—Many a farmer's golden visions from the tobacco crop are growing dim. The crops of 1865 and 1866, in the Connecticut River Valley and, to a large extent, elsewhere, are mainly now on hand, and a proposition is made to the cultivators to grow no tobacco this year, in order to sell the crop at high figures. There has manifestly been an overproduction, induced by the high prices during the war. It is a good time for the growers to pause and consider both the moral bearings of the crop and its influence upon other products of the farm. The current of opinion as elicited at the last meeting of the Connecticut State Board of Agriculture, at New Haven, was decidedly against the crop, on economical grounds. It is not denied that a large sum of money may be realized by it from a small plot of ground. But the general confession is that it ruins all the rest of the farm, by leading the cultivator to neglect it. It demands huge quantities of manure, and all he can make goes to the tobacco patch, and he buys a good deal besides. The meadows run out, the pastures become barren, the orchard fruitless; and if the cultivator accumulates funds in the bank, as he may, it is by the ruin of his farm. Ten acres may be splendid, but the other hundred have gone to mullein and hardback. The influence of this crop upon the community is quite as disastrous as it is upon the farm. The tobacco growing district grows poorer. Other farm crops decrease in quality and quantity. Less stock is raised, less beef, pork, butter and other necessities of life. The lands are all the while decreasing in agricultural value, and less capable of sustaining a thrifty population.

TO PREVENT RITS IN ROADS.—The art of road making is yet in its infancy in this country. The roads are not laid out, made, or prepared with reference to economy of draft in using them. Deep ruts are soon worn in them by the common vehicles that pass over them; and these grow worse and worse, until they are almost impassable in Spring. Broad cart tires are a partial remedy for these. Longer yokes, both for oxen and for double horse wagons and carts, compelling the teams to walk in the same line with the wheels that come after them, would be a still better remedy. On most country roads there are toe-paths and two ruts, and it is noticeable that the toe-paths are always in much better order. Longer yokes would bring the paths and ruts together. The feet of the teams would break down the sides of the ruts, and fill them as fast as they were formed. This would improve the road bed, and make the draft of loads easier. We cannot shorten the axle trees without increasing the danger of upsetting, but we can lengthen the yokes with safety.

A BUTTER MACHINE.—A machine for making butter is one of the new inventions in England. It consists of a movable metal cylinder suspended from a small cast iron frame. The bottom of the cylinder is a loose piece of galvanized iron, and above it the cylinder is perforated by a number of small holes. The cylinder is suspended in a bowl of water and the butter is placed in the cylinder and pressed by a screw piston, the result of which is that the butter is forced through the holes into the water in the shape of vermicelli. By this means all the buttermilk is excluded, and the butter is found to be much closer and sweeter than when made by hand.

PICKLED EGGS.—When eggs are plentiful, boil some four or six dozen until they become quite hard. Then, after carefully removing the shells, lay them in large-mouthed jars, and pour over them scalding vinegar, well seasoned with whole pepper, allspice, a few slices of ginger, and a few cloves of garlic. When cold bung down closely, and in a month they are fit for use. Where eggs are plentiful, the pickle is by no means expensive, and is a relishing accompaniment to cold meat.

SWEET POTATOES.—Every spare piece of good land—every row that you can work deep and manure well—should be put in sweet potatoes. They are among the choicest blessings of our favored country and climate, and deserve special labor and attention. "Draws" may be set even in very dry weather, by dipping the roots in a thick batter of woods earth, ashes and fresh cow dung, then pouring water in the hole after planting, putting the draws in pretty deeply, etc., as we have often directed. Soap-suds scattered liberally over your plant bed will greatly increase the growth of "draws." If the weather is very hot when you plant, select the evening for the work.

WATERING PLANTS WITH IRON.—It is stated as a new discovery that wonderful effects may be obtained by watering fruits and vegetables with a solution of sulphate of iron. Under this system beans will grow into nearly double the size, and will acquire a much more savory taste. The pear seems to be particularly well adapted for this treatment. Old nails thrown into water and left to rust will impart to it all the necessary qualities for forcing vegetation as described.

WHITENESS TREES.—The practice of coating fruit and ornamental trees with whitewash is one that cannot be too severely deprecated. The obstruction of the perspiratory organs and orifices, whether affected by the application of whitewash or any other adhesive material, always acts as a source of disease, and in time proves fatal to the tree. When the bark becomes rough and incrustated with moss it should be cleaned by scraping and washing down thoroughly with a solution of soft soap or soda in water, affording smoothness to the surface without obstructing the pores.

TRAINING CUCUMBERS.—In small gardens where it is desirable to make the most of the land, cucumbers can be trained to trellises, or on a fence, and will yield an abundant crop, without occupying any land except the hill on which they grow.

It is said that the Czar of Russia spent about $100,000 per day during his late visit to Paris.

HOW TO SEND MONEY.—We are frequently receiving enquiries upon this point. We have scarcely lost anything by the mails, and consider them safe. The risk at any private will be ours.

We are still asked shall we forward money by mail? Answer, YES. The Agent will notice, as above, that the risk is not his.

TO SUBSCRIBERS.—Any person wishing to subscribe for this paper can do so, by paying the Methodist preacher in the circuit, and forwarding to us his receipt for three dollars, with the address of the subscriber upon it, indicating Post office, State, Circuit, and Conference. The receipt ought to be taken in duplicate.

NEW ADVERTISEMENTS.—The card of Dr. C. J. Bickham will be found in another column. We are glad that this skillful physician has permanently located himself in New Orleans. We have known him for many years, and can recommend him to any of our friends who may need the services of a physician of deep erudition and large experience.

Health of the City.

A week of hot weather, tempered by almost daily and copious showers. One case of cholera—and two of yellow fever. We append the proceedings of the Board of Health at its last meeting on the 25th inst.

A regular meeting of the Board was held last evening. Present—Dr. S. A. Smith, Messrs. Creevy, Pennington and McCoard.

A communication was received from Dr. Southworth, resident physician at Quarantine, stating that under his construction of the law, vessels coming from ports declared infected with clean bills of health, were allowed to pass, those without clean bills of health, were detained at least ten days.

The views of Dr. Southworth were approved, and a resolution was adopted to publish a notice to this effect for the benefit of those concerned.

The President reported that a case of yellow fever had been reported in First District, the patient however, recovered under the treatment of Dr. Brickell. Another case was reported as having taken place on Julia street, which resulted fatally. The patient was a boy sixteen years old, who had lately arrived direct from New York.

A report was received from Dr. Burns, Health Officer, calling attention to the filthy condition of the First-District lockup. A resolution was adopted requesting the city to abate the nuisance.

A VETERAN GONE.—The Memphis Advocate says: The Rev. William R. Dickey, a venerable superannuated preacher of the Memphis Conference, died at the residence of his son, on the 30th ult. A faithful soldier of the Cross, he has fought the good fight, and wears now the crown of the conqueror, through Christ.

The receipts of the American Tract Society at New York, last year were $545,131. The receipts of the Society at Boston were $160,000.

PROLIFIC.—It is said by naturalists that an adult oyster produces between two and three millions of young during a season.

THE SABBATH.

We have frequently been asked, by people who love this day, and are grieved by its desecration, to say something to our readers upon the subject. Few questions have given rise to more controversy, not between the Christian and the infidel only, but among orthodox Christians themselves. We have not room to give even an abstract of the various opinions as to the nature and obligations of the day. There is, however, a marked agreement in the conclusion reached, that the observance is of sufficient obligation to make it binding upon the Christian conscience. Barrow, Calvin, and Paley agree substantially with Horsley and Edwards on this point, however much they may differ from them as to the origin and continuance of the primitive and legal institution.

"The Sabbath was made for man, and not man for the Sabbath." It is a necessity for the human race—especially for the religious well-being of man. It is indeed one of the bulwarks of religion, and important to the spread of the Gospel. The moral force of the Sabbath is beyond estimate. Its stated recurrence, with its sacred associations, exerts a powerful influence for good. It compels the careless to recognize God, and think of spiritual things once in seven days. It has a monumental and anniversary significance, connecting the idea of religious obligation with some of the great facts and doctrines of inspiration. Apart from pulpits and sermons, the Sabbath itself is a preacher of eloquence and power. As under the law it was "for a perpetual covenant," and as "a sign between God and the children of Israel forever," so the Christian Sabbath has something of the same character in its reference to the new covenant and the work of redemption.

Leaving out of the question the physical necessity of refraining from labor and resting on the seventh day, the need of this much time for spiritual improvement is obvious enough to the devout mind. The Christian can not well do without it. One day in seven especially devoted to this very thing, free from the cares and interruptions of business and labor, is needed to build up personal piety and to keep ourselves in the love of God. He will grow in grace who makes the Sabbath a day of religious study and devotion. The negligent and imperfect observance of it will inevitably lead to declension in piety and to backsliding, if not to final apostasy. The Sabbath was made for man, to facilitate the promulgation of the Gospel and to promote personal piety. It may be a physical necessity, but it is a still higher spiritual necessity. It is intimately connected with the salvation of the world and with our personal holiness. Suppose there were no other warrant for the institution than this of religious expediency and the highest necessities of our spiritual nature? Is not this sufficient reason for Christian people, and is not the divine will clear?

The manner of keeping the Sabbath is perhaps best determined by the end proposed—especially by the religious purpose contemplated. Whatever interferes with this must be wrong. Any thing which comes in conflict with the interests of the soul is out of place. The day should be observed so as to secure the greatest possible spiritual good. It would be well for us, on this day, to banish the ordinary themes of secular and political talk, to lay aside the newspapers and other books for the Bible and works decidedly religious; and to devote so much of the time as is not occupied in public religious services to family religion, personal meditation, reading, and prayer. Many have but little time for these things during the week, and this is a reason why the Sabbath should be improved to the utmost.

We are prepared to admit that the rigor of the Jewish Sabbath does not belong to the Christian, and that puritanical "blue laws," are any thing but a true exposition of its benign and gracious spirit. Neither as ascetics nor as epicures should we observe it. Sunday should not be a day of feasting, neither of fasting, because it is Sunday. There is a golden mean which obviates the need of much work either in the kitchen or out of it, and which, at the same time, invests the day with cheerfulness and satisfaction. The Sabbath, indeed, should be made a glad day to all—not a day of bitter herbs and sack-cloth. It should be invested with the joyousness of the blessed morning in which the Lord arose, and so kept that servants and children look forward to it with delight, and welcome it as the type of heaven.

As a Christian duty, there is too much laxness in the observance among professors of religion. Unnecessary work is done. In town many go on send to market, the open family grocery is countenanced by their patronage, the counting-room is clandestinely visited, and the postoffice draws even more strongly than the Church. In town and country the day is too much given up to visiting and social reunions. In the country there is work done which Saturday evening ought to anticipate; and with too many the day is religiously wasted and given up to the road, and social enjoyment. We can not help but notice also how many good people always manage to bring Sunday into their days of travel and recreation. To get a Sunday into the period of absence from business is a clear gain, and to make it tell to business ends in the time-table is a still greater gain. How to take and use the Sabbath for profit or pleasure, without too gross a violation of the institution, seems to be the study of many, whose shrewdness in making a bargain does not altogether forsake them in their dealings with God.

Denial and sacrifice are often connected with this duty. The enlightened and conscientious Christian will make them, and feel that he gains more than he loses by them. How far legislation ought to be invoked in enforcing the Sabbath is not easy to determine. That Christians should be protected in their observance of it is evident. But this admission, if unqualified, opens too wide a field for legislative action. Purely as a question of religion and conscience it hardly comes within the province of legislation at all. But as a public recognition of Christianity, and as due to the physical and spiritual necessities of the people, the laws ought to secure a Sabbath to the country. The government, at least, might cease to be the chief of Sabbath breakers, and give the day to thousands of its employees who are now deprived of its benefits. Military parades might be held on a week day, and mails and postoffices might be closed without detriment to any body.

We wish there were no traveling, no buying and selling, no extravagant pleasure taking on Sunday. Should there be a legislative prohibition of these things? Christianity can not be legislated into the world. It must enter through the lives and testimony of Christian men. It is this agency that we invoke—a more careful and conscientious observance on the part of our religious people. Let your light shine in this direction, and let your religious calling exhibit itself in the right keeping of the Lord's day. We know of nothing that will go farther to impress the truth upon the world, and to deepen the piety and power of the Church.

EMORY & HENRY COLLEGE.—The advertisement of this well known Institution appears in this week's issue of our paper. Health and economy will both be secured by sending to Emory & Henry, and Dr. Wiley's character and reputation sufficiently vouch for the moral and religious influences, and the thorough educational advantages which will surround those who may be entrusted to his care.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Minden, La., June 19th, 1867.

We have much to be thankful for, but more to be humbled on account of, in this immediate section of country. Never having been visited by a raid, an overflow, or a pestilence—the people have escaped from much suffering that has befallen others. The drought was very bad here last year, the country is "hard up" for bread, but there is no starving. There has been a number of destructive tornadoes—and the early rains have been superabundant. The last few days have brought us grateful showers—and all are now hopeful of a moderate crop.

The religious aspect of this immediate locality is improving and decidedly hopeful. We have a large, finely organized, and well disciplined Sabbath School under the able management of Bro. Shea. I know you would be delighted to hear the children sing. We are giving special attention to the instruction of the children from house to house and to the Sunday-school. Tell Bro. Foster, in some things—(not in numbers or appliances) we will compare favorably with his Felicity road Sunday-school. Those children did sing heavenly that morning!

Our congregations are large, serious, well-behaved. There is a decided increase in the religious interest. We had several penitents on Sabbath night. Our prayer-meetings are largely attended. The Spirit of God is moving upon the people. I like a gradual work. We are praying for the baptism of fire. God truly is calling aloud by His judgments and by His mercies.—The Church of God needs a deeper baptism, the ministry more of faith, self-denial, power. We must be united—this is a precarious time with vital, evangelical piety in this country. Let every one buckle on his armour afresh—I hope to report to you gracious revivals of religion. Amen.

Truly and affectionately,
T. B. WHITE.

We are permitted to take the following extract from a private letter written by Bro. Norfolk to W. H. Foster, Esq., of this city.

WESTERN TEXAS, June 3, 1867.

We have some pleasing intelligence to announce to you, if you have not yet heard it. Early last Fall there was a two or three days' meeting, appointed to be held at Cottage Hill. Brothers Noble, Caldwell, and Loc. Kinnison were in attendance. Very early in the meeting there was a revival influence—manifested itself in the congregations which from time to time attended the ministry of the word. It continued to grow in interest until, from Weston, were added the old and the young, to the increasing numbers that participated in the general excitement. Convictions for sins were deep and pungent. The altar, for prayer, was crowded with weeping, trembling penitents. The young man and maiden, the old man and matron were there. It would have done your soul and body good to have witnessed the bright conversions that took place, almost day and night. After our meeting had continued for about two weeks or longer, the Weston people requested that the meeting should be adjourned to this place, which was accordingly done. So far from abating in interest, after it was brought to this place, it seemed to grow in interest. From this place it was adjourned to Monterey. Many of the young converts fell into ranks and marched over to that place, thus going up to the help of the Lord against the mighty. At that place they had a gracious revival. The meeting continued near three months before it closed, and there were about 130 who professed to have found the Lord in the pardon of their sins. To God be all the glory. O what wonders the God of our fathers hath wrought for us in our midst! He deserves the glory.

Our Church has been called to mourn the death of one of her most aged and exemplary members. Bro.

Horn is no more! He departed this life a few weeks since. We have not been made acquainted with the particulars of his closing scene.

DISTRICT MEETING.

YAZOO DISTRICT—MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE.

The District Meeting for Yazoo District—Mississippi Conference—will be held at Sweetwater Church, seven miles north of Lexington, Holmes county, Miss., commencing at 9 o'clock on Thursday, the first day of August next. All the official members of the district are invited to attend, and I hope they will feel it their duty to be present and participate in the deliberations and exercises of the meeting. We will be glad to welcome brethren from other districts. I regret that I can not promise the presence of Bishop Pauc, as his engagements are such that he can not attend. Invitations have been extended to preachers from a distance, and I hope they will find it convenient to come.

The district stewards are urged to be present, as it will be their duty to elect lay-delegates to the next Annual Conference.

The introductory sermon will be preached by Rev. W. P. Barton, or Dr. W. H. Lyons, alternate.

The following will be the order of business:

1. Organization of the Meeting.
2. Appointments of Committees.
3. Reports from Pastors.
4. Reports from Committees in the order in which they were appointed.
5. Miscellaneous business.

The following will constitute the business of the Committees, with the chairman of each:

1. Removals: with the best plan to promote them. T. M. Ward.
2. Sunday-schools. J. D. Newsum.
3. Missions. G. D. Wade.
4. Education. E. H. Moninger.
5. The Pastorate. Geo. W. Boile.
6. Ministerial Support: with the best plan to secure the salaries of the preachers. W. B. Lewis.
7. Church Property and Parsonages. T. C. Parish.
8. Circuit Boundaries. H. Williamson.
9. Church Class and Camp Meetings. P. Howard.
10. Church Publications. W. P. Barton.
11. Religious Interests of Colored People. S. Johnson.
12. Public Worship. Presiding Elder.

The preachers will please announce the meeting, as all the official members may not see this notice. Brethren on arriving will report to Bro. J. D. Newsum, preacher in charge of Black Hawk Circuit.

LATEST NEWS.

Personal Reception of the President at Boston.

Boston, June 25.—At 10 o'clock this morning the President, accompanied by Secretary Seward, Postmaster General Randall, Surgeon Norris, Col. Wm. G. Moore, and others of the party, were escorted to the capital by several members of the Governor's staff, and a committee of the municipal authorities. Thousands of persons, of both sexes, were observers of the scene. Loud and repeated huzzas by the multitude greeted the Chief Magistrate of the Republic.

The Secretary of State immediately afterwards received similar honors, and they acknowledged the compliment by bowing with heads uncovered. Again there were huzzas, and with music of bands they entered the capital. Seats had been provided in the hall of the House of Representatives, to which they were escorted. A number of ladies and some of the most prominent officers of the State and leading citizens were present.

Soon after all the company had entered the hall, Gov. Bullock, addressing the distinguished visitor, said:

Mr. President—It is a great pleasure to have the opportunity of welcoming you in this hall in the presence of gentlemen who are connected with the administration of Federal and State Governments, and to present you to our fellow-citizens. I wish you could tarry longer to observe more thoroughly our objects of local history, institutions, and our people. We regard the visit of the President to the United States as an augury of the harmony, prosperity, and ability of our Union. [Applause.] The President renders an important service to the whole country by becoming himself an example promising a mature acquaintance productive of the affection of. We are one in political interest. It is in the cause of the general welfare, as well as with a pride, that I take great satisfaction in welcoming you to the capital Massachusetts. [Applause, in which all the spectators joined.]

The President replied: Governor—In response to the welcome which has just been tendered by you, as the Chief Magistrate of Massachusetts, I can only say my sincere thanks for the kind and hospitable attentions of which I have been the recipient since I came to your city. You have said that a visit by the Chief Magistrate of the nation calculated to bring about harmony and cordiality of feeling which should exist among the several States. I think I know how to appreciate the sentiment, and I do not intend to make an address being presented on this occasion, but I can not refrain from a few remarks. If we were all more in contact with one another and could see and understand one another better, the difference operates practically in keeping somewhat apart, and which is the greater part imaginary, disappear. [Applause.] The peritosis, and I might say our duties, would then be more in harmony with all the States of the Union.

It has been said that our country is too large to hold together, will take the converse of the proposition, and say it is too large to divide. The whole can not be divided without the parts of parts without the whole. [Applause.] We should be united, prosperous, and happy. [Applause.] Then, I behalf of those I represent, let the people through you for manifestation of their kind regards. [Great Applause.]

Lieut. Gov. Claflin then welcomed Mr. Seward, who responded but eloquently.

Boston, June 26.—The Presidential party left at 8 A. M. Thursday at the railway gate repeated cheers at parting. They were accompanied at Farmington by a large assemblage with a band of music. At Worcester, part of the escort from Boston returned. President was called on by a speech by the assembled throng, but merely expressed his thanks. Similar scenes of hearty welcome and respect occurred at every station.

SPRINGFIELD, June 26.—The Presidential party was here met by staff of Gov. English, Mayor and City Council of Springfield.

NEW YORK, June 26.—The Russian, from Liverpool, bringing intelligence that the council of English Reform League had an address to the working men of Europe, denouncing war and maintenance of large armies. Barmah is still threatened famine.

WASHINGTON, June 25.—The was occupied to-day in the evidence regarding the death of Booth, whose diary was produced. Col. Conger was on the stand testified that the diary was in same condition as when he five weeks ago before the Joint Committee, and as when taken from Booth.

The Court of Claims rendered judgment against the United States in fourteen cotton claim cases involving $110,000, under the restitution to loyal owners, holds twelve other cases under review.

Internal revenue receipts for $659,000.

WASHINGTON, June 26.—There was nothing startling developed to-day in the Surratt case. Grant was on the stand testifying in regard to seeing Jacob Thompson at Vicksburg. There was sharp colloquy between the two regarding Thompson. The prosecution declined saying why Thompson was connected with conspiracy, but wished to connect him with him and prisoner in money matters. Mary Benson, on the stand, testified that she lived in Canada, and she got her own and her husband's expenses and $20 per day. Prosecution announced that would close the evidence in three days more.

WASHINGTON, June 26.—Col. Kellogg, of New Orleans, telegraphs the Secretary of the Treasury denying the report of a fever there. Secretary Welles addressed a letter to Stanton regarding the cation from Sickles for a vessel to enable him to carry out the recon- struction law. He says the depart- ment would not feel justified in using funds for such a purpose; besides, he has neither officers nor men for such vessel.

The State Department has ad- vices of the total wreck of the Sacramento off Madras. No lives lost.

Hon. H. E. Peck, Consul General of Hayti, is dead.

Speculations regarding General Grant's answer to Sheridan are un- worthy of the least credit. The nature of the document is kept a profound secret here.

There were only four members of the Judiciary Committee present at the meeting to-day, and they ad- journed until to-morrow.

Internal revenue receipts to-day $485,000.

The President is expected to re- turn on Friday.

GALVESTON, June 25.—An Austrian passed through this city this morn- ing, en route for the North, repre- senting himself to be an officer of Maximilian, and stated that the Emperor had been pardoned, on condition that he would leave the country or visit the ports of Tampico or Vera Cruz are open for his departure.

FOREIGN.

BIRMINGHAM, June 20.—The ha- rangues of Scott and Murphy against Catholicism led to great disturbances here within the last few days. There has been great excitement, which looked at one time as though it would lead to very serious consequences. At least one hundred thousand people were in the streets. The mob held the city, marching through the streets singing Glory Hallelujah, John Brown, and other choruses. The riot act was read, and troops were ordered to the city from Man- chester, but they were not obliged to fire upon the people. The police used their cutlasses on several per- sons, but none were killed. The excitement has somewhat lulled, and it is thought the disturbance has ended.

Murphy has persisted, every night, in making long and offensive speeches against the Roman Cath- olic Church, including its rites. An attempt to renew the disorder has been put down, and compara- tively quiet now prevails.

LONDON, June 21.—The authori- ties of this metropolis have voted to present an address of congratula- tion to the Emperors of Russia and France on their escape.

PARIS, June 21.—The Emperor's Government has decided to make a considerable reduction in the mil- itary forces of the Empire. The present session of the Corps Legis- lative, which accomplished a large amount of business, is approaching a close.

VIENNA, June 20.—evening.—The Austrian Government has granted an amnesty to all political offenders, including Kossuth.

WARSAW, June 21.—The Emperor Alexander has issued a decree sus- pending confiscations in Poland.

LONDON, June 19.—The English Government, warned by the land- ing effected by the squad of Fenians at Dungarvan, have stationed men- of-war in the channel, to guard against the repetition of similar attempts.

LIVERPOOL, June 19.—evening.—The liabilities of the firm of Frazer, Trenholm & Co. have been ascer- tained to exceed their assets by nearly a million pounds sterling.

LIVERPOOL, June 28.—evening.—Cotton generally ruled dull; Mid- dling Orleans declined 1d.; sales to-day 10,000 bales; Middling Up- lands 11d.; Middling Orleans 11 1/4d.; Broadwaters and provisions gener- ally unchanged; common Wilmington 12s.; fine American 12s.; tur- pentine 81s. 3d.

Registration in Louisiana.

HEADQUARTERS FIFTH MILITARY DISTRICT, New Orleans, La. June 22, 1867.

Gen. U. S. Grant, Commanding Armies United States, Washington, D. C.

General—I am in receipt of a tele- gram from the President, through Brevet Major Gen. E. D. Townsend, A. G. U. S. Army, directing me to extend the registration in this city and State until August 1, unless I have some good reasons to the con- trary, and ordering me to report such reasons, for his information. Also, stating that in his judgment this extension is necessary to a full and fair registration, and that the time should be thus extended be- cause the other district commanders will not get through before that time.

My reasons for closing the registra- tion in this city were because I had given the city two and a half months, and there were no more to register. I have given the State two and a half months, and registra- tion will be exhausted by that time. I did not feel warranted in keep- ing up boards of registrations, at large expense, to suit new issues coming in at the eleventh hour.

The registration will be complet- ed in Louisiana at the time speci- fied, unless I am ordered to carry out the law under Mr. Stansberry's interpretation, which practically, in registration, is opening a broad macadamized road for perjury and fraud to travel on. I do not see why my registration should be de- pendent on the time when other dis- trict commanders get through. I have given more time for the regis- tration of Louisiana than they pro- pose to give in their commands, for I commenced six weeks before they did. I regret that I should have to differ from the President, but it must be recollected that I have been or- dered to execute a law to which the President has been in bitter antago- nism. If, after this report, that the time is to be extended, please notify me, and it will be done. I would do it at once, but the President's telegram was conditional, and there is suffi- cient time left to issue the necessary order.

P. H. SHERIDAN, Major General.

THE GREAT ECCLESIASTICAL GATHER- ING AT ROME.—A letter of the 30th of May from Rome says that the priests continued to arrive. They are determined to be in good time, for a celebration which will only occur on one of the very last days of this month. A great number of high church dignitaries are expected. The archbishop of Tolosa has writ- ten to have a convent prepared for his accommodation and for that of eighty priests, who are to compose his suite. Such an enormous retinue is unprecedented. In 1862 the Bishop of Moulins arrived in Rome with a train of sixty-five ec- clesiastics. The letter says:

"From the centenary of St. Peter, Rome will be full of priests, but it is thought few laymen will come. Meanwhile, great preparations are making. This morning the Munici- pal Council met to decide what should be done to celebrate it. The festival will be also exclusively ec- clesiastical. There will be an ex- traordinary illumination of the basi- lica of the Vatican on the 29th, and one of the basilica of St. Paul on the 30th. There are not enough lusters in all Rome, and they have been sent for from Naples and Florence, so you may judge that it is intended to do something magnifi- cent in the way of illumination in those two churches. The pope is much pleased; it is his delight to see many bishops arrive, and to get up a fine procession with a string of mitred heads. He spends a great deal, and does not know what economy is. This prodigality does not please the cardinals, but who would dare to tell the pontiff that he must spend less? Pius IX only does like all other popes; he thinks of the time present, and leaves it to his successors to take care of the future. Under his pontificate the Roman government has incurred 500,000,000 of debt. This is pret- ty well for a small State. But mil- lions are expected from the bishops who are to arrive; it seems thought they will all come with heavy chests of gold. Such hopes are very much exaggerated."

THE CONFISCATION QUESTION.—As Chief Justice Chase, in overruling a decision of Judge Underwood, has decided that the property of a rebel cannot be confiscated for treason until he has first been duly convicted of that crime, it will follow that in the confiscations which have been made of the property of Confed- erates, it will have to be returned by the parties now holding under such titles. The decision of Judge Chase will also operate as a partial exting- uisher on the confiscation schemes of Thad. Stevens and his followers.

MOST TRUE.—The late Girard Hal- lock, for many years editor of the Journal of Commerce, was an honest, upright, and pious man, respected and honored even by those who dissented from his opin- ions on public matters. His ability and diligence were rewarded with large pecuniary gains, which he employed freely for the purpose of doing good to his fellow-men.

At New Haven he erected a spa- cious church edifice at his own ex- pense, which cost over $100,000. One day a gentleman said to him: "You have two things to be thank- ful for which jointly bless but few men—a large purse, and a large heart in the disbursement of it." To which Mr. Hallock answered: "From my boyhood I have observed that every man grew covetous in pro- portion as he grew rich, if he did not keep giving. I am making money, and must give it."

He knew that wealth got and held for the gratification of covet- ousness, debases if it does not ruin its possessor.

SLAVERY TO BE GRADUALLY ABOL- ISHED IN CUBA.—The New York papers, of the 19th, say it is reported from Cuba that a royal decree was received from Spain freeing all col- ored children born of slave parents on the island one and after the 1st July next.

OBITUARIES.

Sister AMELIA SIMONS, wife of Dr. G. W. Lincy, and member of our charge, died April 24th, 1867, aged 35 years. Sister Lincy joined the M. E. Church, South, at a protracted meeting on Obispo Circuit in 1851, since that time she has been a consistent member of the church and a devoted Christian. She was a de- voted and affectionate wife and mother, leaves a bereaved husband with the care and responsibility of several young and interesting children. They share the warm sympathies of the church. Sister Lincy's mind was not in a condition during her last illness to give any particular account of her faith or spiritual state. But she gave the evidence of a consistent Christian life for twenty years, which we think the best evidence of a peaceful death.

Her remains were taken to the church—her funeral was preached from the 90th Psalm—a large funeral procession followed her to the grave where she rests in hope. "May we live the life of the righteous, that our last end may be as theirs."

JOHN PIPES.

CHARLES G. BOWEN, departed this life on the 8th of June, 1867, on mail boat, between Mobile and New Orleans. Having been on a visit to a daughter in Texas, and taking "Pneumonia," our brother breathed his last, and very quietly fell asleep in Jesus, while within only a few hours travel of his home, in Macon, Miss.

Born in Knoxville, Tenn., June 8th, 1808, but "born again" in 1834, our departed brother truly lived the life of a most devoted and consistent Christian, and leaves to his stricken family and friends, an example singular, rich, and precious.

In 1840, Bro. B. moved to Macon, Miss., and for the period of fourteen years filled with much acceptability the office of Probate clerk, for Nottoway Co. In the church he was steward, and class leader, and his place, as teacher in the Sunday-school, was never vacant without sufficient cause.

The children, all loved him most dearly, and when his death was announced, many of them wept, as though they had indeed lost a friend and a father.

The precious remains of our sainted Bro. Bowen lie in the village grave-yard, and we are constrained to sing,

"How blessed the righteous when he dies,
When sinks a weary soul to rest,
How mildly beam the closing eyes,
How gently heaves the expiring breast."

NEW ADVERTISEMENTS.

A STEAMER FOR BELIZE RIVER.

Have obtained a vote of the Assembly of British Honduras of a subsidy of $100 specie for each trip I may make in a steamer up the Belize River to Rihmond, and back for six months, and a monopoly of the steam naviga- tion of that river for five years, and I wish to get some one to join me in furnishing and running a small steamer. This is a first rate chance for any one having a suitable boat, or the cap- acity to buy one, as the rates of freight will pay very well, and the trade of Guatemala must pass that way.

Persons who may call on me next Tuesday in Dr. Keener's office, 112 Camp street, or write to me to his care, can make some arrangement.

THE CHILD'S CORNER.

Kissing a Sunbeam.

The incident of a baby kissing a sunbeam has never been more sweetly told than in the following poem, which we find in the Watchman and Reflector. The author is CLARA B. HEATH.

Sunbeams creeping through the anapies
Flashed across the window pane,
Lighting up the darkened parlor
Like a shower of golden rain.

Baby May, her white hands softly
Folded in her mute surprise,
Sat upright upon the carpet—
Baby wonder in her eyes.

Soon, the little hands unloosing,
Each essayed the toy to grasp,
But in vain—no shining substance
Found she in their tightened clasp.

Down she went upon the carpet,
Creeping softly round and round,
Making eager, restless movements,
And a cooling, baby sound.

Reaching now, and now bewildered
By her shining, new-found prize—
All the while the baby wonder Beaming in her violet eyes.

Wearied with the vain endeavor,
Both the dimpled hands grew still,
But the bright eyes watched the sunbeams
Flitting here and there at will.

Watched them as they danced about her
Lighting up the carpet gray—
Then she softly stooped and—kissed them!
Darting, precious Baby May.

A Pity to have an Empty Seat.

A few weeks ago a gentleman was obliged to go to a distant depot at an hour when there was no conveyance thither. So, although very weary, and not strong, he was obliged to get out on a walk of two or three miles. After he had gone a little way, he was overtaken by a gentleman and a little boy in a carriage. The fine horse was at once reined in, and his owner said with a smile, "I presume, sir, you are going but a short way; but this little fellow insists on my asking you to ride with us. I told him I had no doubt you were going to the first station; but he said, 'The gentleman is a stranger, father; it is very easy to ask him. It always seems to me such a pity to ride with an empty seat!'"

Now, that ride, which cost the gentleman neither money, time, nor trouble, was a real blessing to a weary minister of Christ; and he told him so when he thanked him and the dear boy who prompted the kind civility.

"It is a way he has, and always had, sir," replied the father. "From his cradle, he could never enjoy what he could not share with others. If he has any new gift or pleasure, his first thought is for those less favored. It is a way he got from his mother."

It was truly a beautiful "way" that boy had; and it should be a lesson to all boys, and boys' mothers too who hear of him. Remember this, you who have horses at your control to use for convenience or pleasure: "It is a pity to have an empty seat." Remember it, mothers, when training your boys for lives of unselfishness. The little things of to-day will grow into great things of years to come. The boy who is selfish with his toys and his comforts will be so with his money and his sympathies when a man; for the heart grows harder, rather than softer, by the flight of time.

A carriage is not the only place where "it is a pity to have an empty seat." It is a pity to have one in the Church or the Sunday school; and there would be a less number so, if all boys had the spirit of the little fellow of whom we have written. Say with him, "It is so easy to ask," and then go among the boys you know, and urge them to fill an empty seat. You can do more in this way than your minister or your teacher can. Let every empty seat in the house of God and in the Sunday school have a voice for you that shall send you out into the highways and hedges to compel less favored children to come in; and in so doing, you yourselves will receive a blessing. The noble boy who insisted on offering a ride to a stranger thereby made a new friend who will never forget him, and who may return the kindness a hundred-fold in ways he little dreams of now; and better than this, he pleased God, who commands us to be careful to entertain strangers, and reminds us that many, in doing so, have entertained angels unawares.

Never fret about what you can't help, because it won't do any good. Never fret about what you can help, because if you can help it do so. When you are tempted to grumble about anything ask yourself, "Can I help this?" and if you can't don't fret; but if you can, do so, and see how much better you will feel.

If you do wrong or get in trouble, go at once to your mother and tell her about it. She is your best friend, and will be your best counselor.

Curly-head and the Candy.

BY UNA LOCKE.

Mamie had made some molasses-candy, and little Curly-head knew it. But where had he hid it, was a question. Not on the long shelves behind the pans; not on the short shelves behind the dried apples and boxes of spices; not in one of the cupboards. She had looked in all these places, and every other place she could see or think of. No: there was the meat roaster, now, hung at the top of the buttery; and here was the applesauce barrel, so convenient; just under. Yes, it must be there. Up climbs Curly-head upon the applesauce barrel, and peeps in with eyes like two stars. She has found the candy—yes, she has found it! Clementine and she will eat it now! She reaches eagerly up; a tilt, a quick turn of the barrel—plump, splash! Curly-head is over shoes and stockings in applesauce!

Well, there was a cry of distress, you may be sure, reached mamma's ears, piercing them like a knife. "O, dear!" sighed she running to the rescue, "my applesauce!—You'll have to eat it, every bit, yourself now! There, give me your hands, and jump."

Curly-head jumped, and so did the applesauce; all over the floor, the shelves, the plastering, above and below it flew, making a nice piece of work; and then think of the shoes and stockings and pantalettes! And she did not get any of Mamie's candy after all, till he was ready to divide it. How much better it would have been for her if she had waited!

Let us not be impatient for our pleasures before it is proper we should have them. I know of men who were not satisfied with a quiet business and a good salary, but made haste to be rich, and found themselves worse off than Curly-head in the applesauce barrel. So with scholars, who thought to get the prize by pretending they had kept all the rules when they had not; they reached after something that did not belong to them. God is never deceived; and he can, at any moment he pleases, expose them to open disgrace. "Bread of deceit is sweet to a man; but afterward his mouth shall be filled with gravel."—Child at Home.

A BRAVE SAILOR.

Many a Christian must covet the fearlessness of the honest fellow, the annexed account of whom in some of the writings of Dr. Robert Newton is so well adapted to stir every pious heart to emulation. Few, indeed, if they would sincerely try the experiment, would be found unable to imitate the sailor's courtesy:

A merchant and ship-owner of New York was standing at the entrance of his warehouses conversing with a gentleman on business. A pious sailor belonging to one of his vessels came to the warehouse to enter it, but observing that the door was occupied, modestly stepped aside, not willing to interrupt the conversation.

While waiting there he heard the name of Jesus profanely used, and, on turning to look, he observed that it was his employer who was speaking. Instantly changing his position, and standing in front of the gentleman with his head uncovered, and his hat under his arm, he addressed the merchant in this language:

"Sir, will you excuse me if I speak a word to you?"

The gentleman, recognizing him as one of the crew of his vessel recently arrived, and supposing he might have something to say about the business of the ship, told him to speak on.

"You won't be offended then, sir, with a poor, ignorant sailor if he tells you his feelings?" said he.

"Certainly not," replied the merchant.

"Well, then, sir," said the honest hearted sailor, with much feeling, "will you be so kind as not to take the name of my blessed Jesus in vain? He is a good Savior! He took my feet out of the horrible pit and miry clay, and established my goings. O, sir! don't, if you please, take the name of Master, the Lord Jesus, in vain? He is your Creator as well as mine, and He has made you, and preserves you and is always doing you good."

This was said with so much earnestness and feeling that the gentleman was quite touched. His eyes filled with tears, and he said—

"My good fellow, God helping me, I will never again take the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, the Savior, in vain."

"Thank you, sir," said the honest tar, and, putting on his hat, he went away to his work.

HOUSEKEEPER'S DEPARTMENT

BY UNA LOCKE.

CORN CAKE.—Three cups of corn meal, one cup of wheat, two tablespoonfuls of sugar, two teaspoonfuls of cream of tartar, one teaspoonful of salt. Mix well together; while dry, add one teaspoonful of soda, dissolved in warm water. Mix the whole to a thin batter with milk or water, and bake in a quick oven.

PANCAKE WITH FRUIT.—Take four eggs, a cup of cream, or rich milk, and flour enough to make a thin batter; add a little fine sugar and nutmeg. Butter the griddle; turn the batter on; let it spread as large as a common pudding plate; when done on one side turn it with a pancake slice; have ready some nice preserve, spread it over, roll the cake up; put on flat dish; sift on a little fine sugar.

GINGER SNAPS.—One cup of molasses, one of sugar, one of shortening, one egg, one tablespoonful of ginger, one of vinegar, one teaspoonful of saleratus.

SILVER CAKE.—Take the whites of six eggs, two and one-half cups of flour, one and one-half cups of sugar, half cup of butter, two-thirds of a cup of cream or sweet milk, half teaspoonful of cream of tartar and a little soda.

LEMON CAKE.—Beat six eggs, the yolks and white separately, in a solid froth; add to the yolks the grated rind of a fine lemon and six ounces of sugar dried and sifted; beat this a quarter of an hour; shake in with the left hand six ounces of flour; then add the whites of the eggs and the juice of the lemon; when these are well beaten in put it immediately into this and bake it an hour in a moderately heated oven.

CAPITOLINE CAKE.—Take one cup of butter, three-quarters of a cup of molasses, three-quarters of a cup of sugar, three cups of flour, one gill of sweet milk, one teaspoonful of saleratus, two eggs; add currants, citron, spice, cloves and nutmeg.

MOLASSES CAKE.—One cup molasses, half cup of butter, half cup of water, four eggs, one teaspoonful of soda, one teaspoonful of ginger.

MISSISSIPPI CAKE.—One pint of the best yellow corn meal, one pint of buttermilk, two tablespoonfuls of melted butter, two eggs, a teaspoonful of saleratus.

TAPIOCA PUDDING.—Four tablespoonfuls of tapioca, one quart of milk, four eggs (leaving out the whites of two for icing, sweeten to taste and flavor with vanilla. Soak the tapioca over night in a little water, boil the milk and pour over the tapioca; when it is lukewarm, add the sugar and eggs, well beaten. Bake about one hour; ice it when cool.

OLD-ENGLISH PLUM PUDDING.—To make what is termed a pound pudding, take of raisins well stoned, currants thoroughly washed, one pound each; chop a pound of suet very fine and mix with them; add a quarter of a pound of flour or bread finely crumbled, three ounces of sugar, one ounce and a half of grated lemon peel, a blade of mace, half a small nutmeg, half a dozen eggs well beaten; work it well together, put it into a cloth, tie it firmly, allowing room to swell—and boil not less than five hours. It should not be suffered to stop boiling.

RHUBARB CHAMPAGNE.—The rhubarb should be perfectly ripe, cut into thin slices and slightly bruised; to every five pounds add a gallon of soft water; cover it with a cloth, let it stand nine days, stirring three times a day; strain off the juice and to every gallon add four pounds of white sugar, the juice of two large lemons and the rind of one, pared thin; to fine it use one ounce isinglass for every nine gallons; let it ferment three weeks; add one pint of brandy, and bung it up; bottle it after three months, putting in each bottle a teaspoonful of white sugar and a teaspoonful of brandy.

CURRENT WINE.—Bruise sixteen pounds of ripe currants, mix-well with three gallons of water, strain it off, put to it fourteen pounds of loaf sugar; strain it into a small keg, adding a pint of raspberries and a pint of brandy; stop it down and let it stand for three months.

RASPBERRY WINE.—One quart of ripe raspberries to every quart of water; bruise them in it and let it stand 48 hours then strain the liquor into a cask, and add three pounds of loaf sugar for every gallon; after two months bottle it, and to each bottle add a tablespoonful of brandy.

RABBIT SOUP.—Cut one or two rabbits into joints; lay them for an hour in cold water; dry and fry them in butter till about half done, with four or five onions, and a middling-sized head of celery cut small; add to this three quarts of cold water, one pound of split peas, some pepper and salt; let it stew gently for four or five hours, then strain and serve it.

A CARD TO LADIES.

There will be Apartments and Hours specially for LADIES, and also for LADS under fifteen years of age during the SUMMER MONTHS, in Penmanship, Arithmetic, Book-keeping, etc. If classes are formed immediately, at DOL-BEAR COMMERCIAL COLLEGE, corner of Camp and Common streets.

NEW YORK,

REV. DR. DEEMS, Pastor.

Strangers visiting New York are respectfully informed that a congregation composed of Christians of different Protestant denominations, has been organized under the pastoral charge of the Rev. Charles F. Deems, D.D., of North Carolina.

The service is held every Sunday morning and night in the Large Chapel of the University, Washington square.

The Pastor's residence and post office address is 221 West 34th street. Strangers in the city who are sick or in distress, may freely call upon Dr. Deems for pastoral service.

When any members of any church comes to New York to engage in business, let him call promptly on the Pastor of the Church of the Strangers. Especially let this be done in the case of young men, who will have a cordial welcome.

Newspapers through the country, friendly to the enterprise, will please copy this advertisement and allow it to stand. je 15-67 1m

DRUG STORE FOR SALE.

At Hartsboro, Miss., two miles back of Mississippi city. There is no other drug store within 10 miles of it, and it has done a good business for several years. A large dwelling house in the same lot is for rent, and is well adapted for boarders. The building in the layout on which the village is situated, is excellent. The renter could have the furniture: all on very reasonable terms. For particulars apply to

Literature, Agriculture, and General Intelligence, and containing Reports of

Battles, Incidents and Accidents of the War, never before published.

BY GEN. D. H. HILL,

LATE OF THE SOUTHERN ARMY.

This is the cheapest Magazine in the South,

and it has reached an issue of 12,000 copies,

monthly, in the first year of its existence. Its circulation embraces all the Territories and all the States except three of the North-Eastern.

Encouraged by this generous patronage, the Proprietors are using every exertion to make the Magazine more attractive and more useful.

The services of some of the most talented writers of the country have been secured; and no article will be published, which has not real substantial merit. Engravings and illustrations will be introduced.

The Magazine aims to preserve a record of the heroism and endurance, the wit and humor of the Southern soldiery.

NEW ORLEANS MARKETS.

From the N. O. Price Current.

We have again to notice an inactive market, with very little movement in any branch of trade. Operations in our leading staple, in particular, have been on a very limited scale. In fact, the stock on sale is now so much reduced as to afford little scope to buyers, and being distributed among a number of factors, is held by them without inconvenience, and generally at figures above the limits of the pending orders. The movement in Western Produce has been mainly confined to a jobbing business, in which rather firmer prices have been realized than were current last week, especially for fresh Flour, Corn and Oats. The decline in grain appears to have been arrested, but the demand has fallen off to such an extent that were the receipts more liberal, holders would be compelled to store or make sufficient concessions to excite a speculative enquiry. The sales of Sugar and Molasses are mostly confined to limited retail transactions, but Tobacco continues in good request for export, and commands full prices, particularly for the heavy descriptions.

COTTON.—We left the market, at the time of our last, quiet and rather unsteady, since which the movement has been checked by the discouraging tenor of the foreign news, and the moderate extent of the supply on sale. On Saturday, in particular, these causes, and buyers being unwilling to go on unless at figures which factors would not accept, restricted the business to 600 bales, taken by a very few parties, to complete pending orders, at figures showing no quotable change from previous rates. On Monday the movement was again of limited extent, being confined to 1100 bales, while prices exhibited no quotable variation. There was, however, rather a better enquiry for the higher grades, of which there is a scant supply on factors' tables, and which consequently command disproportionately high figures compared with the poorer qualities. Tuesday the market opened with a limited enquiry, the demand being checked not only by a continuance of the unfavorable influences noticed above, but also by the rainy weather, and the sales were consequently confined to 700 bales, at prices showing no variation in Middling, but a partial falling off in Good Ordinary and Low Middling.

This makes an aggregate for the past three days of 2400 bales, taken partly for the North, but mostly for foreign export.

The receipts proper since Friday evening comprise 1455 bales, against 1311 during the corresponding period last week, showing an increase of 144 bales.

The receipts at this port, since the 1st of September, (exclusive of the arrivals from Mobile, Florida and Texas,) are 701, 909 bales, against 662,268 bales to same date last year, and the decrease in the receipts at all the ports, up to the latest dates, as compared with last year, is 145, 623 bales. In the exports from the United States to foreign countries, as compared with the same dates last year, there is a decrease of 54,990 bales to Great Britain, of 18,952 to France, and an increase of 43,775 bales to other foreign ports.

We quote as follows:

Low. Refused... 20 to 21
Good Ordinary... 22 to 23
Low Middling... 24 to 25
Middling... 26 to 27

TOBACCO.—There has been an active enquiry since our last review, especially for the heavy descriptions. The market is firm and we continue to quote:

Monetary.

The Money Market proper has continued recently dull, with but few operations in any department, partly owing to the restricted movement of our general trade, and partly to the reluctance of capitalists to make investments, unless on securities of the highest character. Occasional negotiations of mortgage paper are made at from 9 to 12 per cent per annum, lenders exacting not only productive city property, but signatures which can be relied on for prompt payment of principal and interest.

SUMMER IS COMING.

Meadow flowers, fair and sweet,
Can you feed the summer?
Can you hear her dainty feet,
Coming softly, light, and fleet?
Will ye not outrun her?

Spring up, white anemone,
Graceful as court lady;
Ring, ye bells, merrily,
Hyacinths stand cheerily,
She will greet you, may-be.

Bleeding red, rose-campion fair,
Like a rustic beauty,
Hides behind the maiden-hair,
While veronica, the rare,
Opens blue eyes from duty.

She is coming, is our queen,
Softest breeze shall wait her;
Palm boughs of freshest green
Wave where'er her robe is seen,
Little brooks bring laughter.

Every joyous scent and sound
Rises swift to greet her;
Even the dull insensate ground
Shares the fragrance all around,
Let us go and meet her.

SINGULAR MARRIAGES.

Parties sometimes marry under very singular circumstances. Let me give a few examples. There was in Tennessee an old gentleman who had the eccentric habit of opposing the marriage of all his daughters, (of whom he had several,) and after their marriage coming into friendly terms with them and their husbands. Folks said it was a sharp way the old gentleman had of escaping incidental wedding expenses. A young man of acquaintance paid his addresses to one of the daughters—and she accepted—but the old gentleman, according to his custom, firmly opposed and refused consent, although the young man was worthy and without any objectionable feature in his case. There was no use waiting and laboring to mollify the old man's feelings, so they determined to proceed. The day was appointed, and the minister, and some friends came at the appointed time. The old gentleman was apprised of their coming. He compelled his daughter to go into the cellar—it was a cellar with two apartments, the lower was locked up (or down) in the innermost room. Two doors—both locked—seemed indeed a dead lock upon all further proceedings. To break the locks and force an entrance would have been a criminal and indictable offence. The cellar, however, had windows—grated windows—to one of these the young lady repaired, and the young gentleman and the minister drew nigh, and the minister began to utter the solemn words that were to make them man and wife. The old man in the mean time was raving; and with his gun in his hand threatening to shoot—lest the marriage should raise her to a social equality, and, as a consequence, she would not obey him as before. He wished to marry her as he had several thousands in property which he wished her and their children to inherit. His persistent refusal to marry her until the last hour was certainly a strong exhibition of persistency of will.

wife. The deed was done. The young husband then demanded the liberty of his lawful wife, and the old man was compelled to comply. In a few weeks he took them home, and the young man became a member of his household and his favorite son-in-law.

I was present at a marriage near the town of C—, in Tennessee. It was marked by the following peculiarity. The young gentleman lived in Tennessee and obtained his license in his own State. The young lady lived just within the Kentucky line, was a minor, and her father was dead. Legal formalities required that the marriage should be celebrated in Tennessee. At the appointed hour—4 p. m.—guests, minister, and bridegroom assembled at the home of the bride. Then the company—about fifty—all mounted, forming a long and handsome cavalcade, took the road, two and two, for the State line. This was indicated by a large and spreading oak in a long lane. Under its shadow the party drew up, the parties to be married heading the column, the minister facing them, and all remaining mounted. The solemn words were uttered and the vows spoken that made them man and wife. As they sat they joined hands—all as usual—save that the salutation of the bride had to be deferred to a more convenient season.

I witnessed a remarkable marriage in New Orleans in 1853. There was a freedman, a barber, who accumulated some property. He bought a young colored woman and she became his wife, though he would never formally marry her. Some ten days or more before his death his brother-in-law came to me and said he wished me to marry his sister and brother-in-law. I went to the house, which was comfortably furnished, and found the sick man on a lounge. I sat down by him, and after waiting a few minutes, I remarked: "I have come to marry you." He looked straight at me, but said not a word. Supposing him a little deaf, I repeated the remark in a louder tone, but with no change in the result. I waited a moment, then rose up and said: "I was sent for to marry you, but I suppose it is not your wish," and left him. Some eight or ten days after this, my door bell was rang about half past two a. m., some two hours before day. I went on the gallery and asked what was wanted. I was answered by the man who first came for me, who said that I was wanted to marry his brother-in-law. I inquired if it was his brother-in-law himself that wished to be married. He said he had sent for me. So I dressed and went with him. I found the sick man almost gone. I said: "I have come to marry you." He bowed consent. The woman stood by the bed and I proceeded with the service. At the proper time I put his cold hand in hers, and pronounced them man and wife. In about two hours he breathed his last.

I afterwards learned the reason for his singular conduct was, that he feared to marry the woman as long as he had any hope of living, lest the marriage should raise her to a social equality, and, as a consequence, she would not obey him as before. He wished to marry her as he had several thousands in property which he wished her and their children to inherit. His persistent refusal to marry her until the last hour was certainly a strong exhibition of persistency of will.

LETTER FROM ABINGDON.

ABINGDON, Va., June 19, '67.

Mr. Editor:—Did you ever spend a summer among the mountains? Not at a fashionable watering place, but in the wild, beautiful mountains, far away from the noise and dust of the great world? Did you ever drink in the pure, fragrant, morning air, amid the dewy shadows, wild flowers, and birds of the mountains? Did you ever spend, with a dear friend, a season of recreation in some cool sequestered dell in the mountains? If not, there is an earthly joy yet untasted by you. Come to south-western Virginia, and I will show you the glory of the mountains. Come in the summer—come now. The sun glows with a fierceness at mid-day, that drives all but the hardy sons of toil into the shade; but our mornings and evenings are delightfully cool. Our sleep is never disturbed by oppressive heat, or by that mortal enemy to man's peace, mosquitoes. We have a pure, bracing atmosphere; crystal streams, flowing fountains, grand old forests, live fruits, and abundant harvests, with an intelligent and refined society as you can find any where in the land. Here is the early home of William C. Preston, of South Carolina—the home of Gen. John B. Floyd—of the Campbells. Whites, and others of "immortal name." Our classic little town has a record of no mean fame. Come and see us. I will say no more on this subject, lest you think I am boasting.

Our Commencement at Emory & Henry College, and also at Martha Washington, closed the first of the present month. All went off well. These Commencements recall the happier days before the war, and also furnish evidence that we are recuperating. You will see by the Catalogue that Emory & Henry had 133 students in attendance the past year. We had not quite 100 at Martha Washington College. A change in the vacations at Martha Washington has been made. Our fall term commenced the first Wednesday in August, and closes the 21st of December. The spring term opens the 19th of February, this giving a winter vacation of eight weeks. This arrangement it is thought will suit our Southern patrons. Their daughters will be with us in this delightful summer climate during the hot season, and at home during the Christmas holidays. It is never too hot to study here. We have large and splendid buildings, with lofty ceilings, surrounded by a campus of ten acres highly improved—a perfect paradise of sylvan beauty. Bishop McTear pronounces it one of the finest locations for a Female School in the South. The College buildings are only a few hundred yards from the railroad depot. We are ten miles west of Emory & Henry, so that young men going there, who have sisters coming to our school, can not only travel with them, but see them frequently during the year.

Bishop McTear, and Rev. J. E. Evans, of the Georgia Conference, spent some time with us about our Commencement. The Bishop preached the Annual Sermon before the young ladies, and brother Evans delivered the Literary Address. We were delighted with both.

The crops in this part of Virginia promise well. Business is reviving, and things generally as prosperous as we ought to expect in a territory. You shall hear from me soon again. Yours truly, W. G. E. CUNNINGHAM.

From Hayes' Open Polar Sea.
SUNRISE.

While the days were thus running on, the sun was crawling up toward the horizon, and each returning noon brought an increase of light. I carried in my pocket at all times a little book, and early in February I began to experiment with it. When I could read the title-page at noon I was much rejoiced. By and by the smaller letters could be puzzled out; then I could decipher with ease the finest print, and the youngsters were in great glee at being able to read the thermometers at eleven and twelve and one o'clock without the lantern. On the 10th of February I made the following memorandum on the margin of my book: "Almost broad daylight at noon, and I read this page at 3 o'clock p. m." My calculations placed the sun at the horizon on the 18th.

The appearance of the sun became now the one absorbing event. About it everybody thought and everybody talked continually. No set of men ever looked more eagerly for a coming joy than did we for the promised morn,—we, half-blooded beings, coming from the night, bleached in the long-continued lamp-light, and almost as colorless as potato-sprouts growing in a dark cellar. We all noted how to-day compared with yesterday, and contrasted it with this day a week ago. Even the old cook caught the contagion, and crawled up from among his saucepans and coppers, and, shading his eyes with his store-hardened hands peered out into the growing twilight. "I think dis be very long night," said he, "and I likes once more to see de blessed sun." The steward was in a state of chronic excitement. He could not let the sun rest in peace for an hour. He must be forever running up on deck and out on the ice, book in hand, trying to read by the returning daylight. He was impatient with the time. "Don't the commander think the sun will come back before the 18th?" "Don't he think it will come back on the 17th?" "I'm afraid, steward, we must rely upon the Nautical Almanac." "But mightn't the Nautical Almanac be wrong?"—and I could clearly perceive that he thought my ciphering might be wrong too.

Meanwhile we were tormented with another set of gales, and we could scarcely stir abroad. The ice was all broken up in the outer bay, and the open sea came nearer to us than during any previous period of the winter. The ice was nearly all driven out of the bay, and the broad, dark, bounding water was not only in sight from the deck, but I could almost drop a mine-ball into it from my rifle, while standing on the poop. Even the ice in the inner harbor was loosened around the shore, and, thick and solid though it was, I thought at one time that there was danger of its giving way and going boldly out to sea.

Strange, too, along the margin of this water there came a flock of speckled birds to shelter themselves under the lee of the shore, and to warm their little feet in the waters which the winds would not let freeze. They were the Dovekie of Southern Greenland—the Uria of the naturalist. They are often seen about Disco Island and Upernivik in the winter time, but I was much surprised to find them denizens of the Arctic night so near the Pole. It was a singular sight to see them paddling about in the caves, under the ice-foot, at 30 degrees below zero, uttering their plaintive cry, and looking for all the world like homeless children, shoeless and in rags, crouching for shelter near a door-stoop on a bleak December night. I wanted one of them badly for a specimen, but it would have required something stronger than the claims of science to have induced me to harm a feather of their trembling little heads.

February 18th.
Heaven be praised! I have once more seen the sun.

off after breakfast to some favorite spot where it was thought that he might be seen. Some went in the right direction and were gratified; others went in the wrong direction and were disappointed. Knorr and others of the officers climbed the hills above Etah. Charley limbered up his rheumatic old legs, and tried to get a view from the north side of the harbor, forgetting that the mountains intervened. Harris and Heywood climbed to the top of the hill behind the harbor, and the former shook his Odd Fellow's flag in the sun's very face. The cook was troubled that he did not have a look at "de blessed sun;" but he could not gratify his wish without going upon the land, and this he could no more be induced to do than the mountain could be persuaded to come to Muihomet. He will probably have to wait until the sun steals over the hills into the harbor, which will be at least twelve days.

My own share in the day's excitement has been equal to the rest of them. Accompanied by Hodge and Jensen, I set out at an early hour toward a point on the north side of the bay, from which I could command a view of the southern horizon. We had much difficulty in reaching our destination. The open water came nearly a mile within the point for which we were bound, and it was no easy task picking our way along the sloping drifts of the ice-foot. But we were at last successful, and reached our look-out station (hereafter to be known as Sunrise Point) with half an hour to spare. The day was far from a pleasant one for a holiday excursion. The temperature was very low, and the wind, blowing quite freshly, brought the drifting snow down from the mountains, and rattled it about us rather sharply. But we were amply repaid by the view which was spread out before us.

An open sea lay at our feet and stretched far away to the front and right of us as we faced the south. Numerous bergs were dotted over it, but otherwise it was mainly free from ice. Its surface was much agitated by the winds, which kept it from freezing, and the waves were dancing in the cold air as if in very mockery of the winter. It was indeed a vast bubbling cauldron,—seething, and foaming, and emitting vapors. The light curling streams of "frost smoke" which rose over it sailed away on the wind toward the south-west, and there mingled with a dark mist-bank. Little streams of young ice, as if struggling to bind the waves, rattled and crackled over the restless waters. To the left, the lofty coast mountains stood boldly up in the bright air, and near Cape Alexander the glacier peeped down between them, coming down the valley in a gentle slope from the broad mer de glace. The bold front of Crystal Palace Cliffs cut sharply against this line of whiteness, and the dark, gloomy walls of Cape Alexander rose squarely from the sea. Upon the crests of the silent hills, and over the white-capped cape, light clouds lazily floated, and through these the sun was pouring a stream of golden fire, and the whole southern heavens were ablaze with the splendor of the coming day.

The point of Cape Alexander lay directly south of us, and the sun would appear from behind it at exactly the meridian hour, rolling along the horizon, with only half its disk above the line of waters. We awaited the approaching moment with much eagerness. Presently a ray of light burst through the soft mist-clouds which lay off to the right of us opposite the cape, blinding them into a purple sea and glistening upon the silvery summits of the tall icebergs, which pierced the vapory cloak as if to catch the coming warmth. The ray approached us nearer and nearer, the purple sea widened, the glittering spires multiplied, as one after another they burst in quick succession into the blaze of day; and as this marvelous change came over the face of the sea, we felt that the shadow of the cape was the shadow of the night, and that the night was passing away. Soon the dark-red cliffs behind us glowed with a warm coloring, the hills and the mountains stood forth in their new robes of resplendent brightness, and the tumbling waves melted away from their angry harshness, and laughed in the sunshine. And now the line of the shadow was in sight. "There it is upon the point," cried Jensen. "There it is upon the ice-foot," answered Dodge,—there at our feet lay a sheet of sparkling gems, and the sun burst broadly in our faces. Off went our caps with a simultaneous impulse, and we hailed this long-lost wanderer of the heavens with loud demonstrations of joy.

And now we were basking in the atmosphere of other days. The friend of all hopeful associations had come back again to put a new glow into our hearts. He had returned after an absence of 126 days to revive a slumbering world; and as I looked upon his face again, after this long interval, I did not wonder that there should be then to bow the knee and worship him and proclaim him "The eye of God." The parent of light and life everywhere, he is the same within these solitudes. The germ awaits him here as in the Orient; but there it rests only through the short hours of a summer night, while here it reposes for months under a sheet of snows. But after a while the sun will tear this bright sheet asunder, and will tumble it in gushing fountains to the sea, and will kiss the cold earth, and give it warmth and life; and the flowers will bud and bloom, and will turn their tiny faces smilingly and gratefully up to him, as he wanders over these ancient hills in the long summer. The very glaciers will weep tears of joy at his coming. The ice will loose its iron grip upon the waters, and will let the wild waves play in freedom. The reindeer will skip gleefully over the mountains to welcome his coming, and will look longingly to him for the green pastures. The sea-fowls, knowing that he will give them a resting-place for their feet on the rocky islands, will come to seek the moss-beds which he spreads for their nests; and the sparrows will come on his life-giving rays, and will sing their love songs through the endless day.

A MONTH WITHOUT A FULL MOON.—A curious circumstance occurred this year, which has only now led to some discussion. Last February was a month in which no full moon occurred. A few journalists in Italy got hold of the fact, and at once pronounced it to be an exceedingly rare occurrence. Some said it could only happen once in 25,000 centuries; others, more moderate, simply adverted to the fact that there was no mention of such a thing in Genesis. After much dispute in the columns of the daily papers, the question at length caught the eye of the well-known astronomer of Milan, M. Schiaparelli, who has now disposed of it summarily, showing that in 1847 the very same thing took place, their being full moons on the 31st of January, at six minutes past 9 a. m., and on the 2d of March following, at forty-five minutes past 3 a. m. In 1828 there was a similar occurrence at Washington.—Gallegnani.

GROUP.—Wring a linen cloth—cotton will do, but linen is preferable—out of cold water, fold it so as to make several thicknesses, and place it upon the child's chest, then fold a dry flannel and wrap carefully over it. Warm the child's feet with hot stones if necessary, and cover with plenty of bed clothes and let it go to sleep; you cannot perceive when it wakes up that it has even a cold. It acts like a charm.—Exchange paper.

EFFECTS OF ALCOHOL.—Experiments made by Drs. Ringer and Rickards on men and animals go to show that the temperature of the body falls nearly as fast after the use of alcohol in doses sufficient to produce intoxication, as after death itself. The facility with which drunkards freeze to death is explained by this fact. The abuse of alcohol also accounts for one-fifth of the insanity in the country.

CHARLESTON, July 2.—A young freedman named Frank Smith, has applied to the Secretary of War for a cadetship at West Point, from the First Congressional District of South Carolina.

General closing of bar rooms in this city enforced. No drinks obtained except at hotels.

POSSIBILITY OF FALLING FROM GRACE.

Mr. Editor: "Eternal vigilance" is said to be "the price of liberty." Sleepless vigilance, untiring energy, unflinching devotion, and a living, invincible faith in Christ are safeguards to a life of piety. In the absence of these there is great and fearful danger of falling away from steadfastness, and from the love of God in Christ.

This very important subject may be aimed from three stand points; and,

1st. Conversion does not destroy the accountability of man in this life. He is still held amenable to the laws of the church of which he is a member. He is reigned up and tried, and dead with as one capable of doing wrong as well as right. Even the churches which profess to believe in the impossibility of falling from grace, are as ready to investigate the misdemeanor of their members, as those professing to believe in the "possibility of falling from grace." All the courts of justice in England and America examine as rigidly into the conduct of believers brought before them for trial as into the department of sinners. There are no exemption provisos for Christians in the Law Books. Also, the Legislatures of all countries apprehend no distinction in making laws, in so far as the bearing of the laws are concerned—all are alike subjects of human legislation.

2nd. The Bible is either insincere upon this subject, or else God torments His children needlessly by giving warning in strong and alarming terms, if there be no possibility of falling from grace. Upon this point the Bible abounds in warnings adduced from incontestable and known facts, and also, revelations of the Divine judgment and caution. How alarmingly grand the warning by reference to "angels which kept not their first estate, but left it, whom God hath cast down and reserves under chains of darkness unto the judgment of the great day." The warning by reference to Adam's sin and the consequence is impressive. The pen of inspiration informs us that "through the offense of one, many be dead," and "by the offense of one judgment came upon all men to condemnation." "In Adam all die." Also by the fall of Lot's wife. Upon this, our Saviour in emphatic and impressive terms bids all "Remember Lot's wife." The warnings furnished us as the counsel of the Divine judgment and caution, show its possibility, or argue that God who is "infinite in understanding" and righteousness, torments His children needlessly. Amongst the many passages upon this point a few will suffice for the present purpose: The Apostle Paul, under the guidance of the Holy Spirit, utters these words: "Let him that thinketh he standeth, take heed, lest he fall." Now if the class of persons addressed under the term "him," merely think they stand, (and in fact are not standing,) the Apostle simply plays upon words, and is guilty of a right down imposition upon the Christians in those as well as in these days. Again; "if we sin wilfully after that we have received the knowledge of the truth, there remaineth no more sacrifice for sins, but a certain fearful looking for of judgment and fiery indignation which shall devour the adversaries." And again: "It is impossible for those who were once enlightened, and have tasted of the heavenly gift, and were made partakers of the Holy Ghost, and have tasted the good word of God, and the powers of the world to come, if they shall fall away to renew them again to repentance; seeing they crucify to themselves the Son of God afresh, and put him to an open shame."

3rd. The doctrine which teaches that a Christian cannot fall away, changes Moral into Natural Philosophy, and, taking a logical antecedent, embraces and inculcates the Moral Philosophy of "Inertia." Natural philosophy teaches that "matter" has no power of action—no power to move or resist motion. This applied to moral beings, teaches that they cannot resist "the effectual call;" and when called and embraced can no more resist the power that set them in motion, than the earth can the attraction of the sun, or the falling limb can resist its approach to the earth. All this looks beautifully to a student in Natural Philosophy, but how can he understand and apply this doctrine to moral beings? Therefore, this principle of the possibility of falling from grace is sustained by Moral Philosophy, or the doctrine of "Inertia," as taught in Natural, is transferred to and becomes a part of Moral Philosophy.

From Good Words.

THE DISCIPLINE OF THE BODY.

During the last fifteen years, quite enough has been said about the sanctity of the body; and the protest against the strange fancy that we honour and please God by impoverishing, torturing, and marring the beauty of what He "curiously wrought," has run into extravagance. A few sensible men proclaimed war against the saintliness of physical weakness, filth, and suffering; and before long their wholesome doctrine was incessantly reiterated with all the passion of fanaticism in every part of the country; the new gospel found its way into innumerable sermons and lectures, into the columns of every newspaper and the pages of every popular magazine. "Great was the company of the preachers." The "tub" became a means of grace; and a clean skin the sure means of getting a clean heart. Volunteer regiments were addressed as though they were religious orders, destined to regenerate the moral life of the nation. Cricket, rowing, running, and jumping, were to do men more good than praying; and the "trainer" was to accomplish the work which the preacher and the philosopher had attempted in vain.

No doubt it is a very fine thing for a man to be able to walk forty miles a day, but that does not make him a saint. There is no virtue in being sickly; but neither, so far as I can see, is it the highest attribute of piety to have the digestion of an ostrich, or the lungs of a racehorse. Many a fool has had muscles of iron, and nerves of steel; and I imagine that it is even possible to be a member of the Alpine Club, and yet to break all the Commandments.

Still it is true that both the Jewish and the Christian Scriptures speak of our physical nature with honour. They never represent the body as the work of some inferior, and perhaps malignant deity, who so contrived it that we should be constantly tempted to sin. It is God's own handiwork—"fearfully and wonderfully made." It is the visible temple of the Holy Ghost—the only visible temple in which God has dwelt since the glory passed away from the inner sanctuary at Jerusalem. Death is not to destroy it. Sown in corruption, it is to be raised in incorruption; sown in weakness, it is to be raised in power. The Incarnation and the prophecy of the Resurrection have finally redeemed it from contempt. That God was manifest in the flesh is the fundamental article of the Christian creed; and when we listen to the desolate words, "dust to dust, ashes to ashes," we confidently believe that the time is coming when "all that are in the graves" shall hear the voice of the Son of God, "and shall come forth," that the gracious form and the kindly face have not vanished for ever; that the body, not the same flesh and blood indeed, but still the body which it has been pleasant for us to look upon on earth, will reappear among the shining splendours of heaven.

The body, therefore, with its instincts and wants, is not to be treated as the enemy of the soul, but as its friend—a friend of inferior rank, but still a friend. It asks for warmth and clothing, food and shelter, and for ease and rest after labor; and it should have them all. Let men say what they will in praise of the celestial influence of hunger, whether voluntary or involuntary, it is difficult to see that hunger encourages any human virtue, or any Christian grace. As for a hard and severe life, as a rule it is probably as injurious to the intellect and the heart, as it certainly is to physical health and beauty. When the Apostles warned men against "fleshly lusts," there is no reason to suppose that they meant to require Christian people to live a life of discomfort and privation.

But that it is necessary, if we are to live a pure and devout life, that we should firmly control our inferior instincts and passions, has been the common faith of all saints; and carelessness in the discipline of the body is, perhaps, the real cause of the miserably ignoble life of many Christian men. They have no strong and clear vision of God, no vivid anticipation of everlasting blessedness and purity. Their love for Christ smoulders like a half-extinguished fire—without heat, without brightness, without intensity. "Fleshly lusts" unsubdued are the true explanation of their moral weakness and spiritual sluggishness. If a man is conscious that his spiritual nature has no elasticity, that his religious life is dull and heavy, that his prayers have no heart in them, and his thanksgivings no rapture, that his Christian work is feeble and mechanical, a burden to himself and no blessing to others, let him ask whether the flesh has not mastered the spirit, and set himself vigorously to assert his freedom.

Let him ask himself, for instance, whether he would not be a better man if he drank less. It is not merely men who drink till they are drunk that are guilty of intemperance, there are many people who do what is perhaps worse than that. I have heard able medical men give it as their deliberate opinion that a man who gets drunk once a month receives less physical injury than a man who never loses self-command, but drinks habitually more than he ought. Which suffers most morally, it may be hard to determine. Unhappily, drinking which does not end in positive intoxication is regarded as innocent. The men who are guilty of it would resent even an implied censure on their excesses. They think they "live freely," but that they are blameless. Their friends become used to their habits; mere acquaintances say that they never seem very bright or active, but charge them with no sin; their own consciences are drugged into silence; but all moral nobleness and all lofty devotion inevitably disappear from their character. It will not do to speak of excessive drinking as a vice of which only the poor are guilty. No rank or culture exempts us from danger. Medical men have assured me again and again that in houses where no one would suspect it, actual drunkenness is the real cause of apparently inexplicable illness. Now and then I have been shocked at finding that women, educated women, of good family, and occupying a good social position, are guilty of it. There are circumstances which make the temptation to this vice specially perilous to women whose circumstances exempt them from the necessity of earning their own bread. Take the case of a young girl whose home before marriage was a very bright and merry one; she was surrounded with brothers and sisters and troops of friends; her mind was occupied with her music, her drawing, and her books; two or three times a year she made long visits to relatives at a distance; she was as free from care as the lilies—that neither sow nor spin, or as the birds of the air that make the spring-time merry with their songs; her whole life was joyous, varied, and animated. After marriage she has to spend the greater part of nearly every day at home and alone. Her husband leaves her directly after breakfast, and does not return till night. She has her home and servants to attend to; but to a bright, clever girl the managing of household affairs is apt to become depressing. She has children by-and-by, perhaps, but the society of children does not give her the intellectual stimulus and excitement to which she has been accustomed. Her heart dies down. She gets weary of the grey, dull sky under which she lives, and the habit steals almost insensibly upon her of taking stimulants to make her pulse beat faster and her spirits move more lightly. If she does not break it off at once, she is lost. Let her do anything that is at all innocent to escape from her doom. Let her get to her music again or to her drawing; let her spend her time in dressing herself daintily, or in manufacturing the gossip which is common at morning calls; better still—let her can—let her give herself vigorously to some kindly, womanly, Christian work for the poor, in which she can find a real interest. Anyhow, let her get some color, some animation into her life from harmless sources, or else she will soon be ruined; unless she can find healthy excitement somewhere, the dullness, stillness, and sameness of her life will be her destruction.

There is another vice to which we Englishmen are specially prone. Our climate makes a large amount of solid food necessary to us, and for want of genius to do better we eat grossly. We have no scruples about it. We are ravenous and voracious, and feel no self-reproach. I am inclined to think that good cookery might do at least as much for the morals of the country as gymnastics. Dine in Paris on fourteen courses, and you feel lighter and brighter when you have finished than when you began; "do justice" as the phrase is, to an English dinner of the old fashioned sort, and without the liberal assistance of sherry and champagne, you are too stupid to talk of anything except local politics and the state of the crops. French wines will never become popular in this country till we get French cooks. The ethics of dining is a neglected branch of the science of morals which urgently requires investigation. Meantime, let men remember that excessive eating is a foul and disgusting vice; its evil effects may be less obvious than those of excessive drinking, but they are not less real, perhaps they are not less serious. All the finer sensibilities of the soul, all moral grace and beauty, are perhaps more certain to perish in the glutton than even in the drunkard.

The moral degradation which comes from another "fleshly lust"—physical indolence—it is less easy to define. Most of us may thank God that the very circumstances of our life keep us safe from this sin. Few men can help working; most men have to work hard. But sluggishness, an indisposition to make any exertion unless compelled to make it, is sometimes to be met with even in this restless and active age, and in every social condition. I mean that there are people who can never be induced to put out their strength, and who never do anything with their "might." We all know men who continue to the end of their days "unfulfilled prophecies," who have shown in their youth the promise of high achievement, and perhaps the sign of genius, but who leave the world with their fortunes unmade, or their poems unwritten, or their schemes of philosophy unorganized, or their social and political reforms unattempted. Such men are often illustrations of the failure that is the inevitable penalty of indolence. Its moral effects are not less disastrous.

As for some of the tests of sluggishness which are often to be found in good books written for young people, it is difficult to see their value. I cannot perceive, for instance, what virtue there can be in getting up several hours before daylight in the month of January. To make early rising, for its own sake, one of the cardinal virtues, has always seemed to me utterly preposterous. Why should we not wait, as Charles Lamb puts it, till the world is "aired" before we venture out? If a man can do more work in the day when he lies till half-past seven, than when he gets up at half-past five, if he is better tempered at breakfast-time, if his mind is fresher and his heart kinder, for the rest of the day, it passes my comprehension why he should turn out at the earlier hour. Some people think he ought; and I have honestly tried to discover some intelligible explanation of what seems to me this singular article of faith, but I cannot. If through rising late on week-days, a man has to hurry away to business without family prayer, if his temper is ruffled morning after morning by the haste and disorder in which it involves him; if he gets up so late on Sunday that he has to make a violent effort to reach his place of worship in tolerable time, and gradually comes to think that he is quite early enough if he is in his seat five minutes after service has begun, then of course he is to be blamed; but though I have a real respect for traditional wisdom, I have never been able to understand why a man should get up at unseemly hours in the night for the mere sake of doing it.

There is a Sluggishness, however, which is fatal to manly energy and Christian earnestness. Some men fall into such physical habits that they never seem to be fairly awake. Hard work of every kind, whether of muscle or brain, they systematically evade. They "take things easy." They "do not excite themselves." They think they are very harmless, and even very praiseworthy people; and do not see that indolence has grown upon them till the soul is no longer master of itself, or of the body which ought to serve it. The immorality of their life it may perhaps be impossible to make clear to them; but they may be made to perceive that habits which destroy all intensity, and depth, and vehemence of religious feeling must involve them in guilt. Every spiritual impulse is enfeebled, every devout affection is deadened, every act of worship is made a weariness by the sluggishness into which they have permitted themselves to sink. The fiery chariot in which the soul should rise triumphantly to heaven in exulting praise and rapturous adoration has had all its splendours quenched; now and then they may be feebly stirred by the fervor and passion of men of nobler temper, but it is only for a moment; "of the earth, earthly," they have become incapable of the diviner movements and joys of the spiritual life.

Very wonderful is the intimate connection, the subtle interaction, between the forces of our physical and moral nature. It is one of the chief mysteries of our mysterious being. But it is not a mystery merely; it is a fact of infinite practical significance which cannot be ignored without grave peril. The intelligent recognition of it would save many good people from much sorrow, as it would save others from grievous sin. I should like to have the "Diaries" which record the spiritual experience of certain excellent persons, illustrated with notes by wise physicians who had known them intimately. Periods of spiritual desertion, when "the light of God's countenance" was hidden from them, apparently without any reason, might receive a very instructive explanation. It might be found that God had been less arbitrary, or as they would say less sovereign, in his treatment of them than they supposed. I once tried whether the strange vicissitudes of glory and gloom which occurred in the interior life of an eminently good man could be accounted for by the physical causes which his own diary suggested; and thought the materials at my command were, of course, very imperfect, as I had never known him, and could only infer what his physical history was from accidental and fragmentary hints occurring here and there among the record of his labors, his thanksgivings, his confessions, and his bitter cries to God for the restoration of spiritual joy, the attempt was not altogether unsuccessful. A wise discipline of the body would free many a devout soul from the evil thoughts with which it is haunted, and which are supposed to come from evil spirits, from the gloomy fears which are interpreted as signs of a deep-rooted unbelief, and from the despondency which is regarded as the result of the Divine displeasure.

Let no one suppose that I ascribe to merely physical causes all the unspeakable joy and all the unspeakable agony which find a place in the spiritual history of every man who is endeavouring to live, and move, and have his being in God. This material universe may be an illusion; its stars and suns, its mountains and oceans, may all be a mere fleeting show, projected by the action of the powers of my own inexplicable nature, and without any solid and substantial being; but that my soul is saddened and blessed by its failures and triumphs, by the eclipse of the divine glory, and by the recovery of the beautiful vision—this I cannot doubt. It is, however, equally certain that body and soul, flesh and spirit, are so strangely blended, that the lights and shadows which chase each other across our interior life, do not all come from the upper heavens. By honoring the laws of our physical nature, some of us might come to live a more equitable spiritual life.

As for "fleshly lusts" which betray us into sin, the line of duty is simple and definite—we must "abstain" from them. Every man must learn for himself where his own danger lies, and then must resolve, at whatever cost, to have done with his sin. Our choice lies between yielding to the degrading bondage which has made us despise ourselves, and a life inspired with the Holy Ghost—a life of strength, joy, and blessedness. It is of no use to try to pray, unless we "abstain" from that which makes prayer dull and heartless, and renders us incapable of receiving the very blessings we ask for. It is of no use to try to meditate on the majesty and goodness of God, unless we "abstain" from that which almost incapacitates us for lofty meditation, and which, if for a moment we are swept upwards among the harps and songs of angels, sinks us down at once into our earthly dust again. For some men to rise to a nobler life it may be quite as necessary to eat less as to pray more; to spend less time over their wine as to spend more time over their Bible; to ride, to walk, to run, to bathe, as to engage in regular and earnest Christian work.

We wait for the redemption of our body; but we must not wait for the Resurrection to liberate us from "fleshly lusts;" these "war against the soul," and unless they are resolutely resisted and subdued, the soul may be in peril of final destruction.

Changes in the M. P. Church.

The Convention recently held at Montgomery Ala., adopted the following modification in the Discipline and Economy of the Methodist Protestant Church.

THE RESTRICTIVE RULE.—This was so changed as to allow an Annual Conference to station its ministers and preachers in circuits and stations four years, thus lengthening the term one year on a circuit and two years in a station, and making the rule to operate alike in both. This change, so far as we can now remember, was made by unanimous consent.

THE LEADERS' MEETING.—This article of the constitution was abolished, and in lieu thereof an article inserted requiring each station and circuit and mission to hold a monthly meeting, composed of all the members of the Church, together with the pastor, to consider such matters as pertain to the spiritual and temporal economy of the charge. At these meetings applications for membership are to be made; the stewards to report their monthly collections; inquiries made for the sick, for the poor, and general church meetings to be appointed. This, we opine, will accomplish much for the spiritual, social, and financial interests of each congregation if worked efficiently. We hope that every Church will set in motion vigorously, as soon as the article adopted by the conference shall have been published.

A TRAVELING PRESIDENT.—The Constitution made it an imperative obligation for the president of annual conference to travel through his district, to visit all the circuits and stations, etc. The late convention so modified this as to allow each annual conference to use its own discretion as to imposing a duty upon its president. An annual conference can, therefore, after either station or require its president to travel.

An effort was made to adopt probationary membership, but ed, owing in a great measure to the lateness of the hour of the session at which the motion was Ceremonies at Rome.

ROME, June 30.—The religious ceremonies here, in celebration of the 800th anniversary of St. Peter's martyrdom, and the canonization of the martyrs in Japan, was one of the most gorgeous spectacles witnessed since the days of King Solomon. The observances commenced with the general illumination of the city, St. Peter's shining like a great church on fire. At 7 A.M. a grand procession of prelates, monks and soldiers, moved from the Vatican to St. Peter's, the being carried on his throne. A great church was magnificently decorated with cloths of gold, ver, tapestries, paintings and 1000 yards of crimson silk; 1,000 wax candles lighted the building.

One hundred thousand people inside the church, including the King of Naples, foreign ministers, five hundred cardinals, archbishops and bishops, many thousands of men, priests, friars, monks, and soldiers, from all parts of the world are present. The Pope, seated on the Gregorian mass in Greek. Two interruptions occurred: The curtains of one of the altars, but was promptly extinguished. A man became crazy with the splendor, and cut his throat. The Pope at once reconsecrated church that was stained with blood of a suicide.

Listz composed extra musical grand mass, which was accompanied by choirs on the dome of Peter's and cannon at Castle Angelo. The observances continued a week.

Interesting from Mexico.

GALVESTON, July 2.—The trial of Maximilian, Mejia and Miramonte on the 14th. They were sentenced to be shot on the 16th. Juarez suspended the execution three days. They were shot on the 19th, at 11 A.M. Colonels sentenced to six years' imprisonment, lieutenant colonels to years, and minor officers to years. Brigadier generals and exceptional officers are to be tried court martial.

The city of Mexico surrendered to Diaz on the 21st. Juarez sent a congratulatory note with the following directions for the disposal of prisoners:

"The native prisoners you transfer to your own command; put them at liberty according to circumstances in which you find them; the foreign prisoners will retain for the further disposition of the Government."

In the archives taken upon occupation of Queretaro, they found some documents relating to the last will of Maximilian in case of his death. Teodosio Jose Maria Lacunza, and Manuel the assassin of Tacubaya, are declared regents.

Eseobedo writes from Queretaro: "I have by the execution of master traitors made terror the order of the day everywhere. I imposed large contributions on the rich and confiscated their property and their all. When I do not do it in person my delegates have strictly complied with orders, and I hope, before long, my military career, to see the day of every foreigner spilt that in my country."

There is a report that Maximilian was shot in the face; the Mexican Generals in the back, as traitors. Both Liberal and Imperialists at Brownsville condemn the execution. The Rancho is in mourning. Berriozabal had bells of Matamoros rung and acts fired on the reception of news of the execution. He also official information to Gen. Negrete at Brownsville.

The Monterey stage was of $11,000 in coin.

BRAZIL.

We take the following extracts from the Brazil correspondence of the Houston Telegraph. They will be of interest to many of our readers.

Rio De Janeiro, May 22, 1867.

By the goodness of our Heavenly Father, we are here safe at last, and can well appreciate the relief from close confinement, and enjoy rest after all our tiresome wandering. I had a letter not quite finished when we met the returning steamer in the mouth of the Amazon. Only two cases of serious sickness while on board and they are now convalescent. Although very much crowded we had such fine breezes that we suffered but little from heat, except when it rained at night, and forced us to leave the upper deck. We had quite a cold north wind for two days after leaving New York. After that, for twelve days we had most delightful weather. From after passing under the sun in lat. 15 deg we had showery weather until our arrival. The showers would come up very suddenly and as suddenly cease, usually lasting 15 or 20 minutes, rarely exceeding 30.

We saw no land from New York to St. Thomas, where we stopped to coal. Its principal importance is as a coaling station and emporium for supplying European goods to the West Indies and Northern portions of South America. The island is very rocky and poor, and they get all their supplies from fertile islands, mainly from Porto Rico. We gave two cents for oranges by the one hundred, while at Para, Pernambuco and Bahia, we got much better ones at one-half cent each. The town presents a picturesque appearance, situated on the sides of the mountain. There is one level street running around on the shore. I saw a few horse carts but no pleasure carriages, as the drive would not exceed one-half mile. Most of the people are blacks, who speak a little English, French, Danish, and Spanish and sometimes they give you a mixture of all. The negro women seem to do the heaviest work. A squad of fifty brought the coal aboard in large baskets on their heads.

We passed a number of islands for three days after leaving St. Thomas, and ran close alongside of St. Martinique, and saw it in all its charming aspects, and its scenery is well worthy of the pencil and brush of the best artists. Its mountain sides are cultivated wherever it is possible for a man to walk. The soil must be rich and inexhaustible for it has been under cultivation for one hundred years or more. Cane seems to be the only production, and as it is not plowed or sown, its roots prevent the soil from washing away. I was so engaged buying oranges for the steerage passengers with funds kindly furnished by a few friends in the cabin, that I had no chance to see the suburbs of Para and Bahia, which present such rich and gorgeous flowers and shrubbery interspersed with the fruits of the tropics. After passing 3 deg. south lat., we could feel a sensible change daily, until our arrival here, where we have a temperature of 70 to 80 deg. So far we are all delighted with the climate, and think San Paulo will be better than this. I need not give a description of this magnificent harbor, as its general features are familiar to most of your readers. The government hotel is on a hill commanding a fine view of a part of the city and harbor. The whole of it can be seen from our point. We have here nearly five hundred, including Dunn's colonists that came on the "Alarmion." They got here the 18th, just 30 days from New Orleans. We expect to go on the same vessel in a few days, on the 24th, to our final port—Iguape. As it is only forty hours run we will not mind it. Emigrants have free board here until there is a conveyance to the point of settlement. The fare, though plain, is good and wholesome, and the location very healthy. We are gratified to learn that the Government has given our large colony free passage and will also give us six months provisions. So that we will start out of debt, and free from anxiety, and can with good heart go forward to improve our lands, with fair prospect of making a good support, and have our land paid for and yielding a fine annual income in six years, when the last payment is made. Cotton is worth as much here as in New York, and those who have raised it this year will be well paid for their labor at the same time they are preparing for cultivation of coffee.

The Emperor paid us a visit this evening, and was welcomed by a burst of hearty cheers, for his face confirms the universal account of his generosity and courtesy, alike to rich and poor. Long may he live to see his country grow and prosper in material and moral enterprises.

Fish, fruit and vegetables are abundant and cheap. Flour but little higher than in New York. It is the orange and banana season, and you can buy them at from 1-4 to 1-2 of a cent a piece. The best and largest oranges sell not over one cent by retail. The natives eat mostly beans, peas, rice, farina, dried beef and fish. I am much pleased with the cuisine, especially after the long confinement to the uniform diet of the North Americans.

Let me once for all, advise immigrants to lay in but small supplies of dry goods—no groceries—but little bedding, and that in shape of blankets or thin quilts. Most of the feather beds and mattresses got so wet that they were thrown away, or ought to be. Let your baggage be put in small strong boxes or trunks, as you may have to lift them yourself. Bring your money in a draft, and you can tell much better when you arrive what you will need here. Persons having good tools would do well to bring them. The supplies of everything necessary for use here are enlarging, and it will soon be unnecessary to order from the United States, as they will be brought on as good terms here as there. A No. 1 saw and grist mill, with an iron turbine wheel, was added to our colony, and is expected to be in operation in a month after our arrival at home. Those preferring corn bread to manioc can have it. We have received no letters from home folks, but hope to find some waiting us at Iguape. Our address is still the same—Iguape, Province of San Paulo, care of Frank McMullen.

METHODISM AND CHILDREN.

Some time since the London Watchman published a letter, addressed by Rev. Thornley Smith to the President of the British Conference, on the subject of the relation of Methodist parents to the Church. This has been followed by a response, written by "A West Indian Missionary," containing the following argument:

In the first place, it appears to me that the children of Methodism are not looked at from a proper standpoint. Hence follow all mistakes in reference to them. For instance, when the Apostles were commissioned to "preach the Gospel to every creature," it was that "every creature" might be brought into the Church of Christ. Therefore it was graciously added, "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved." This, however, proves that at that time all were outside the Christian dispensation. All then were either Jews or Gentiles. Believing in the Lord Jesus Christ was the boundary line between Judaism, Gentilism, and Christianity. But when the individual Jew or Gentile crossed that line, by believing in the Lord Jesus Christ, he got into the region of salvation with, at least, his infant offspring, because the provisions and promises of the Gospel are to believers and their children. (Acts ii, 39.) I know of but one denomination of Christians who seek to keep their children the other side of this line, and who are guilty of treating all Christendom as Jews and Gentiles until they formally profess themselves believers in the Lord Jesus Christ. When Mr. Wesley was prevented exercising his ministry in the Church of England, he very wisely went before the public calling sinners to repentance, "desecrating them in Christ's stead to be reconciled to God," and like the apostles, setting forth "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved." The results soon manifested themselves in personal applications to Mr. Wesley for prayer and religious instruction. "That we might have more time for this great work, I appointed a day when they might all come together, which from thenceforward they did every week." This was the rise of the "United Society." Such was the origin and beginning of the Methodist Church. Subsequent arrangements became necessary as this Church increased in the world. The administration of the sacrament and other ordinances were not brought into Methodism to make it a Church and secure for it a Church status in the world. These were claimed and conceded as the right, the indisputable and inalienable rights of the Methodist people as a Church. Is it not a reflection rather discredit to us as a body of Christians, that we should put our children outside our own Church, and hold them subject to certain religious disabilities very much to their injury, and, as you have shown, to our own very great loss numerically and otherwise?

We claim, however, to be not only a Church, but a part of the Church of Christ. If the Christian dispensation be "which" all Christians admit—superior to the Jewish dispensation, can we and shall we then deny that our children are at least as eligible for Church membership, and by virtue of baptism, as fully entitled to it, as were those of the Jews in virtue of the covenant of circumcision? Moreover do we not in baptism recognize their membership, and offer thanks to God for having thus admitted them into "his holy Church?" If we are right in so doing, it must be because the thing is true and right in itself. If they are thus admitted into the Church of God, and the Methodist Church is, as we claim, a part of that Church, with what consistency, and for what reason, are they then and forever shut out of the Methodist Church, unless they subsequently seek, as strangers and foreigners, those who had neither part nor lot in the Methodist Church, to enter her pale through the door of class-meeting? You say, "We baptize children in their infancy, and we then give them back, not to godfathers and godmothers, but to their parents as their proper sponsors, to be trained by them for God and heaven." This is in perfect agreement with apostolic teaching on the subject: "Bring them up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord," Eph. vi, 4. St. Paul understood what was implied in such religious training under the former dispensation. (See Deut. vi, 4-7.)

Now, my dear sir, I think what you call the missing link is found here. The children in baptism are "dedicated to God by our office and ministry." (See baptismal service.) The adorable name of the ever blessed Trinity is then "put upon them." Num. vi, 27. They are thus brought into the Church of God through Christ by that Church so dedicating them; and there they ought to be kept and recognized as part and parcel of that Church—"for of such is the kingdom of heaven"—until, by subsequent transgression, they forfeit their membership, according to the word of God. This would do away with the necessity for catechumen classes, as preliminary and preparatory to membership; but it would render catechumen classes necessary and advantageous in the training of our youth. It would also render necessary and give supporters to some service equivalent to confirmation, whereby our children, then no longer requiring to be under tutors and governors, would assume individual responsibility, and take their place and bear their burdens as members of our Church. Such is the order of things in some other Churches. If I mistake not, the Moravians have their baptized class, their candidates' class, and their communicants' class;—and thus they include all states and ages in their membership.

British Methodist Church.

Our English exchanges mention the recent death of Miss Farmer, a Wesleyan lady of high social position, and author of "Tonga and the Friendly Islands." She was also editor of the quarterly magazine of the Ladies' Association for Promoting Female Education in connection with the Wesleyan Missions. She died May 23 in Christian triumph.

It is reported that at a conference between the members of the annual committee of the Methodist New Connection and of the connectional committee of the United Methodist Free Churches, recently held at Leeds, resolutions were adopted declaring the desirability of an organic union of the two denominations, and recommending the appointment of a sub-committee of three persons from each of the connectional committees in order to the removal of difficulties caused by the provisions of the "deeds" under which the Churches were respectively constituted. The sub-committees have been appointed, and there is no doubt that the question will form an important feature in connection with the proceedings of the forthcoming conference.

The West Yans have laid the cornerstone of a theological college at Leeds, the third under their control. The president of the Conference and other leading Wesleyan ministers participated in the interesting services held on the occasion. The foundation stone was laid by Mr. Holden, M. P. The following is a description of the edifice:

"The building is planned at present to accommodate forty students, but is so arranged that it can be easily increased to accommodate sixty." The topography of the plan is a long center building, having a frontage of 255 feet, with wings right and left at its extremities at right angles to the center part, and which also project to the front. There is a most complete classification in the arrangements of the plan, the domestic and the student's portions being kept entirely distinct and separate. The dining hall is placed at the extreme east end of the building, and terminates the division between the domestic and student's portions, the dinner-serving room and kitchen, etc., adjoin the dining hall. The governor's residence is so placed as to insure perfect access to and control over the whole building. The center portion of the center building is occupied by the vestibule, and right and left of it the committee-room and library on the ground-floor, and students' bed-room over. Each student will have a well-ventilated and comfortable sitting and bed room. The four lecture-halls occupy the entire western extremity of the center portion, and are of sufficient size to accommodate the sixty students. There is a covered cloister at the back of the center building, and a spacious kitchen court adjoins the domestic portion. On the upper floor the whole plan is occupied by the students' bed-rooms, governor's bed-rooms, convalescent and sick wards, and servants bed-rooms. The lavatories and offices are placed at the north extremities of the wings on the ground floor, with the bath-rooms, etc., over on the upper floor. The building consists of two stories only, and is designed in the pure early Gothic of the twelfth century. On the vestibule, in the center, rises a picturesque and well-proportioned round clock tower, the top of which is supported by clustered red Mansfield columns. The building is most pleasantly and healthfully situated on the highest ground, and leads from the Headingley Road. It commands a most extensive, varied, and beautiful prospect of the contiguous valleys and the city of Leeds.

The London Recorder, learns that Rev. Henry Barber, of the Monmouth circuit, has resigned his place as preacher upon trial in the Wesleyan body. Mr. Barber's probation commenced at the conference of 1865 since which period he has labored in Monmouth. According to the English Independent, it is his intention to offer himself as a candidate for orders in the Established Church. The same journal adds: "They say St. Aidan's is half full of Wesleyan ministers who have gone over to the Church." It is well known that no pains are spared to induce young local preachers contemplating the Wesleyan ministry to enter St. Aidan's, and it is not unlikely that several of these may be now under instruction there; but as to "Wesleyan ministers," that is, those whose names have appeared as such in the "Minutes of Conference," our contemporary must have been grossly misinformed.

The Surratt Trial.

WASHINGTON, July 2.—The publication of Greeley's evidence creates comment. Mr. Greeley was asked if he would like to see his evidence. A copy was furnished him, which he innocently published. The following are the answers to the questions propounded by Mr. Elbridge (Democrat):

Q. At whose suggestion or solicitation did you become bail for Jefferson Davis? A. Mr. George Shea's; he was a very old and intimate acquaintance and friend of mine. Q. You had no communication with any government officer soliciting you to become bail for Jefferson Davis? A. No sir; nor any intimation that it would be desirable. Q. You had no communication with the President or any of his officers on the subject? A. No sir. Q. Were you, after you came here, or after you went to Richmond, solicited by any officer of the government to go bail for Jefferson Davis? A. No sir. Q. Was Mr. Shea present at the time you signed the bond? A. Yes. Q. At Richmond? A. Yes sir. Q. Had you any communication with Jefferson Davis about going bail for him? A. No sir, I never had any communication by letter or word. I did not know him until I saw him in court. Q. Did any one, after it was known that you proposed to go bail for Mr. Davis, apply to you not to do so, or write to you about it? A. Well, sir, there was a hubbub about it at the time I was here, and Senator Wade and Senator Chandler talked with me about it; I think Senator Cresswell, of Maryland, was also present. I do not recollect any other person. Q. On what grounds did they advise you not to go bail for Jefferson Davis? A. There was a conversation of half an hour between us on the subject; I can not state definitely what particular reasons they urged. They thought it would be bad policy, and that it would have a bad effect on the Republican party? A. I believe so; that was the impression I had. Q. Were there any other persons endeavoring to prevent you from going bail for Jefferson Davis? A. I do not recollect; there may have been one or two personal friends doing so, although it was not generally known that I intended to go bail.

Q. Did they put their objections on party grounds alone? A. Generally. Q. There was no principle involved in it? A. I do not recollect; they made no impression on me other than that it would be injurious to the party. Q. Did you tell them that it was a party question to bail Jefferson Davis, he having been imprisoned so long? A. No sir. In the first place, I was desirous to bring on the trial the first year. I thought we could compel the government to bring the prisoner to trial by a writ of habeas corpus; finally, I thought the time for a trial to any good purpose had passed. Q. Did you go bail for Jefferson Davis with a view of never having him tried? A. No, I wished to have him tried—if the government should ever wish to try him. Q. I understand you as saying that you thought the time for trying him to any good purpose had passed away? A. That was my judgment. Q. Is that your opinion now? A. Yes, so far as I know the facts. If he had anything to do with the assassination of President Lincoln, or poisoning or starving prisoners, I wish him to be tried. I do not know of any facts that justify either charge. Q. You know of no facts of the subject of his connection with the assassination of President Lincoln? A. No sir. None that would connect him with it.

Board of Health.

The Board held a regular weekly meeting on the 2d, Dr. S. A. Smith, President, in the chair.

The President informed the Board that he had received a telegram from J. Cecil Logan, quarantine officer, dated June 29, stating that the steamer Prince of Wales run by, was hailed and refusing to stop was fired at without effect. The dispatch requested that the steamer be sent back, as this was a flagrant violation of the quarantine law. An order had been issued, and the Sheriff of the parish ordered to arrest the captain of the boat.

The President further stated that the Austrian steamer Elizabeth, from off Vera Cruz with dispatches relative to the death of Maximilian, was at quarantine, and anxious to be permitted to come up the river. The President had seen Gen. Sheridan on the subject, and the General had issued an order granting the permission asked for, the steamer being clean and healthy.

It was officially reported that Lieut. Norman Dewey, of the 4th U. S. Cavalry, died at the St. Charles Hotel on the 30th ult. of yellow fever. He had arrived from Indianola, Texas, where there was no fever when he left, but the disease had broken out since. A communication on this subject was read from Collector Kellogg, who stated that he had reliable information that yellow fever existed to some extent in Indianola.

The President further stated that one death had occurred at the base on board a schooner from Indianola.

Dr. Stone stated that he did not think that quarantine did any good. Yellow fever originated here last year, but he thought it necessary, to satisfy the public, and establish a rigid quarantine until the people learned better sense. After some little discussion, the President was directed to instruct the resident physician at the quarantine station to detain in quarantine vessels coming from Indianola, and the further consideration of this subject was postponed till next meeting.

Eight cases of yellow fever had been reported to the Board this and last week, and the reports of attending physicians of these cases were referred to the Health Committee.

Another communication was received from Collector Kellogg, enclosing letters from the U. S. Consul at Havana relative to yellow fever and small-pox at that place. Only seven cases of yellow fever had occurred there, of a mild type. The small pox was of a malignant type, though not as yet pronounced epidemic.

The Board adjourned.

GENERAL BIBLICAL INSTITUTE.—Zion's Herald, in speaking of the removal of the Theological Seminary to Boston, says:

For the temporary accommodation of the school, until suitable buildings can be erected on the charming grounds selected as the future site in Brookline, a span-new five story building has been leased in Boston. It is on Pinckney street, on Beacon Hill, and is admirably adapted to its purpose. It is within two minutes walk of the Convention, under whose arching elms the students will find delightful opportunities for pedestrian exercise, the study of men, and the praise of God.

I have seen a woman professing to love Christ more than the world clad in a silk dress costing $150; making up and trimmings of same, $40; bonnet (or apology for one), $35; velvet mantle, $150; diamond ring, $500; watch, chain, pin and other trappings, $300; total, $1100; all hung upon frail, dying woman. I have seen her, at a meeting in behalf of homeless wanderers in New York, wipe her eyes upon an expensive embroidered handkerchief at the story of their sufferings, and when the contribution-box came round take from a well filled portmanteau, of costly workmanship, twenty-five cents to aid the society formed to promote their welfare. Ah, thought I, dollars for ribbons and poodles for Christ.—Exchange.

THE CABIN-BOY.

From Good Words.

Upon the bridge, at silvery break of day,
I stood, and saw a solitary bark
From her moorings in the harbor dark;
She sailed and sped in the shadowy gray,
Toward the great masts, and flung their pennons
To the wind.

Among the sailors, cheerily as a lark,
I saw a cabin-boy, an elfin spark,
Who, with a smile, and prophetic face,
Stalked about, and watch'd the brightening Heaven.

SABBATH SCHOOLS.

Mr. Editor: Next to the preaching of the Gospel, the Sabbath school is certainly the great means, by which the world is to be converted. And in this extensive field of Christian enterprise, the Methodist Church, with her systematic organization and effective machinery, can accomplish wonders. She is right theoretically, and practically, already far in advance of many other sister churches; but from her view on the subject, the obligations of her ministers, and their duty to organize Sabbath schools in every community, where as many as ten or twelve children can be found, seems that more ought to have been done than has been effected in the past.

I have not a word to say about cities, towns, and well organized communities. In those places, our Church has done much in training the children for usefulness in life and happiness in heaven. But in all villages and sparsely settled districts, some body, or some enthusiasm, or some inadvertence or idleness, or something else is greatly to blame. One reason why the Sabbath school cause flourishes better in cities and well organized communities, than in the country generally, is, that a sufficient number of church members are educated, feel an interest in it, and know how to carry it on. And, another reason, they have the presence and attention of their pastor, Sabbath after Sabbath. While many of our country churches, (I speak of those poor circuits,) are mostly made up of uneducated members, who know but little about this institution of the church, and from their actions, we are led to infer they are still less. Another great mistake is, that their pastor is with them only once a month, and frequently, not on the Sabbath for years together. In many instances, it is to be feared that the preachers are negligent in regard to this important work. Most of us, it is true, organize our Sabbath schools as possible, after entering upon the new charge, but some never seen them again during the year. Many teachers are forgetful of duty, soon become weary in well doing, and fail to attend. This, of course, is discouraging to the children who stop on at a time, until the school goes down. The result is, that thousands of children all over the land, who have been baptized in the church, are growing up in the most abject ignorance. How to remedy this state of affairs is a question of vast importance, and should give much concern, both, to pastors and members.

LINSE WHEAT HARVEST.—St. Louis June 28.—The wheat harvest in Southern Illinois began a week ago, and is now going on as far north as Springfield. The grain is very heavy, ripe and excellent.—The yield of the State will be immense. The harvest has begun also in this State, and, though the wet weather has caused the rust to make its appearance in some places, the crop will be the finest, it is thought, ever gathered in Mis-

HOW TO SEND MONEY.—We are frequently receiving enquiries upon this point. We have scarcely lost anything by the mails, and consider them safe. The risk at any rate will be ours.

We are still asked shall we forward money by mail? Answer, YES. The Agent will notice, as above, that the risk is not his.

TO SUBSCRIBERS.—Any person wishing to subscribe for this paper can do so, by paying the Methodist preacher in the circuit, and forwarding to us his receipt for three dollars, with the address of the subscriber upon it, stating Post office, State, Circuit, and Conference. The receipt ought to be taken in duplicate.

New Advertisements.

BURCKETT, WHITAKER & Co., our next door neighbors, have entered into business as Cotton Factors and Commission Merchants. Mr. Burckett is an old citizen, and for many years engaged in business in this City.

MAVO & HODGE.—This is a new firm, No. 56 Carondelet. We have long known Mr. Hodge, and do not hesitate to commend these gentlemen to our friends as worthy of patronage.

ROBERT L. WALKER.—The card of this old merchant appears this week. Mr. Walker is extensively known and respected. No better business man—none of more experience or tried integrity.

R. K. WALKER & Co., Cotton Factors, 75 Carondelet street. These gentlemen are well known to us, and we take great pleasure in calling special attention to their card in this week's issue.

STOVES.—Those old business men and reliable dealers in Stoves, Austin & Goodwyn, have a new advertisement in the paper this week.—The Good Samaritan must be a superior article. Go and examine their stock.

MARTHA WASHINGTON COLLEGE.—For information concerning this Institution see brother Cunnaynham's letter in another column; also the advertisement, for terms and other particulars. The College can have no higher endorsement than is given by brother Cunnaynham.

BELLS.—Vanduzen & Tift manufacturers of Bells, successors to G. W. Coffin & Co., Cincinnati, Ohio. All wanting anything in this line are referred to their advertisement, continued in our columns. Their bells are warranted, and are, we doubt not, equal to any.

BELIZE, HONDURAS.—Persons having business at this point, and going there will do well to read the advertisement of Messrs. Putnam & Cary, Commission Merchants.

MR. R. S. WEIR has opened a Boarding House in Belize. Emigrants and explorers have their attention called to his card.

THE SOUTHERN FARMER.—This able Agricultural monthly is published at Memphis, Tenn. See the prospectus elsewhere. Every planter and farmer should subscribe. Price $2 a year.

WORE.

The Bishops are setting us all a good example. They are at work. We believe they have always been hard working men, and doing a great deal more than many have thought. The care of the churches, occasional services in constant requisition, and the demand for their presence at dedications, commencements and other occasions, have always in the interval of the Conference sessions fully occupied their time and strength. The character, talents, and office of these honored men have been freely bestowed for the general welfare of the church. Every Circuit has not been visited, nor every District. This was impossible. The vastness of the territory, and their limited number, and the physical infirmities of some of them made such a visitation impracticable. Our conviction is that the Bishops have hitherto done the best they could, and that the church has not always properly credited and appreciated their labors.

Since the last General Conference they have been more active than ever. Reinforced by four of our ablest preachers in the prime of their matured powers, they have been able to take the field more effectively than in years gone by. The Conference work is but a part. The Spring and Summer is covered by plans of systematic visitation, embracing District Meetings, institutions of learning and almost daily preaching. Seven of our chief pastors are thus employed, whilst the venerable Andrew and Early bowed under the weight of labors and years, are far from idle. Bishop Paine, though in feeble health, and suffering much from sickness, has laid out full work, and is attending to it. The circumstances of the country and the condition of the church demand devotion and sacrifice, and these leaders of our Israel are exhibiting both.

Such examples are calculated to stimulate the zeal, and to cheer on our people in working for the Church. We have a wonderful organization for the development of practical religious usefulness. All gifts and graces have an assigned place, and none need to stand idle in the vineyard. Our ministry, our exhorters, our glass-leaders, trustees, and stewards embrace a wide range of devoted activity; and our Sunday-schools and missions are an open door for every one who cares to do anything for Christ.

The traveling preacher, however hampered and embarrassed by want of support, is kept moving within the routine, at least, of his Sunday appointments. More than this must be done, however, or the church will languish, and the waste places of Zion will not be built up. The Sunday-school, class-meetings, and pastoral intercourse are, not only desirable, but necessary for the highest prosperity. Special protracted services, and camp-meetings whenever practicable will do much to tone up the piety of Christians, as well as to increase the membership. It is the pastor's duty to give the "church-meeting" a full and fair trial. If the members can be induced to attend, the benefits are not doubtful. In this meeting every member is brought into personal contact with the financial interests and all the affairs of the Church. The Church meeting well supplied with reports from the class leaders, the Sunday-schools, the stewards, and domestic missions acquaints the members with the precise condition of the Church, and sheds a flood of light upon our individual relations and responsibilities.

In the church of our choice we have many openings for work. The trouble is that but few are faithful in the places they occupy. In the local ministry there are many who seldom preach; few class-leaders perform their duties according to the Discipline, especially in extending their personal oversight to the members committed to their care. An efficient class-leader is the exception rather than the rule. This office alone, if effectively filled would double the power and spirituality of the Church. There is doubtless neglect in the office of stewards.

In some respects this is the most onerous position in the church. In these times it has peculiar embarrassments. Ways and means are harder to devise than formerly, and the general depression discourages, and sometimes baffles effort. Upon the efficient manning of this office, depends in a great measure the effectiveness of the ministry, and the spiritual progress of the work. In a ministerial experience of many years we have known a few good stewards—good stewards according to the genius and economy of Methodism,—but only a few.

Ours is an organization for work. The church ought to put every body to work. In our social meetings, our associations for extending the work of God, and in the multifarious machinery which time has developed, and tried there is a place where every member can make his influence felt. If not exclusively, yet largely, we should exert ourselves through the church organization. Our place should never be vacant in any meeting. Whatever post has been assigned us, should always be punctually filled. By laboring in the Church and for the Church, we contribute our quota to the progress of Catholic Christianity.

There are multitudes of Methodists whose connection with the Church has no other vitality than the appearance of their names in the Register. There are others with whom membership is altogether a one-sided thing. They contribute nothing to the financial strength, nothing to the aggregate spirituality. They know nothing of "the communion of saints," and that fellowship which is an essential feature of Christ's discipleship. How to vitalize this relationship to the Church so as to make it fruitful is certainly an important question. Thousands who owe everything to our Church and its institutions are now lukewarm in their devotion. The great interests affecting its welfare are not studied and prayed over. That there is a Church, and that they have some sort of connection with it seems to satisfy them. It will drift along somehow, and Christianity will retain its hold in the world, whilst they are exclusively absorbed in their farms and merchandise.

That there are many faithful and diligent members we gladly admit. Men and women who love their church and who give, labor, and pray for its prosperity. But there are inefficient members, and idle and unfruitful members. The times call for effort. The adversaries are many, and there is pressing need of live Christians. No one can be doing his duty who does not work, and who does not contribute positively to the strength and prosperity of the Saviour's kingdom. It is a time to "search and try our ways." What am I doing for God? What am I doing for the Church in my own neighborhood? What am I doing in the church, as a steward, a class leader, a preacher, or as a member? Christ has not called you to be a drone and an idler, but to labor in some sphere. The Church is instituted not alone to nurse your piety and to save your soul, but as a means through which you may save others. Go then and work for God. However feeble the effort, however obscure the post, make it a point of conscience to do something. Do not content with a merely nominal co-operation with God's people, but make that connection a living bond which unites you to the warm and throbbing heart of an earnest and progressive evangelism.

St. Louis, July 2.—A letter from Gen. Sherman to Gen. Hancock, says: "We must not remain on the defensive, but follow the Indians up, and attack them on all possible occasions. We must clear them out between the Platte and Arkansas, and then move in force on them beyond those rivers."

GALVESTON, July 2.—The Health Officer of this port having learned officially that yellow fever exists at Indianola, orders that all communication with that port be cut off. He also directs that vessels from Brazos Santiago be stopped at quarantine for examination.

NORTHWARD.

The traveler who, starting from New Orleans, turns his face toward the North, presently finds himself whirling through interminable forests of pine. He wonders if the day will ever come when there will be no more light-wood or lumber, as he sees the hives which portable and fixed saw-mills are making of this primitive growth. A little reflection is sufficient to settle any anxiety upon that point, and he is convinced that more pine grows in twenty-four hours in this country than is cut down in any twelve.—Then the steaming process, which gets as much resin, tar, acid, charcoal, turpentine and petroleum out of one cord of wood as used to be extracted from ten, enlarges the supply, and one is fully satisfied that the piney-woods and piney-woods people will never give out. We believe that these immense belts of pine serve to keep up the pure "bone and sinew" of humanity, as distinguished from its nervous parts. Pine knots and a thin soil equally tend to muscular repose. No labor is required to supply two of the great wants of man, light and heat, where light-wood is handy; and a thin soil discourages farming, and furnishes the conditions favorable to stock-raising. The business of looking after cattle affords much leisure. The people of these regions are, therefore, largely free from the care which develops the nervous system unduly. The only acute excitement they have is secured by the free use of coffee and tobacco, with an occasional mouthful of whiskey.

They raise no corn or vegetables, and rarely have any ground in cultivation, nor any under fence excepting a cattle pen. Their diet consists mainly of flour-biscuits, bacon, and sweet potatoes; their cooking is uniformly bad; they are much given to "chilling"; are sallow, and have an expression of physical languor. They abound in children, and, strange to say, the color of the children's hair, when young, is very much that of white turpentine! We are more particular in these observations, because we had adopted it as a theory that whenever Liberty expired in this country, it would be somewhere in the "far west," among the pine woods; that the pine-knot and the sweet potato, from their abundance, would support a free people when all else failed; that here were the natural haunts of true courage and incorruptible patriotism. In these views we were mistaken. The recent war demonstrated that the piney-woods people were joined to their idols; they, for the most part, could not be persuaded to come out of the woods; or if they came out never rested until they got back again; the thought of "home, sweet home," quite unfitted them for the stern life of the soldier.

Since things have been turned upside down a new feature has been added to these forests. Negroes in vast numbers have ensconced themselves in them; and joined themselves to the charcoal burners, or engaged on their own account in that patient pursuit. We suppose that not less than half a million will be absorbed in this way. The business of charcoal-burning exactly suits the negro, in truth we do not know but he was the original charcoal man. Here he finds himself very nearly upon a level with the white man, with no greater difference than there is between the first and the second "pull" at a jug.—The negro can help to cut and roll logs, appears in the complimentary light of a retainer, and can be serviceable in more ways than one; but he has one bad habit, one weak point; he loves pork, and he will have it. He not only loves pork, but he loves other people's pork; even when he has fat pigs of his own.—Already there are tales of his midnight prowlings and butchering, of his mysterious supplies of fresh pork and beef. Among a stock-raising people the next crime is magnitude to killing a man's hog, is to kill the man himself. In Texas cattle stealing and killing is a much more dangerous business than killing a man. And we fear that the white man will soon be found in violent collision with the thriftless negro over missing stock.

Passing out of these balm-producing latitudes, the train emerges into the open cultivated country south of Montgomery. The soil is fertile, the cotton looks thrifty, and every farm is in a good state of cultivation. We could not but sigh at the thought of there being any more trouble in reserve for the cotton planter, but we fear he is a doomed man. The next year will yield possibly the largest crop the world ever had. All India, and Egypt, and Persia, and the tropical part of the Temperate Zones, will contribute immensely to the great sum. Where rice is two cents per pound, and men eat nothing but rice, other things being equal, cotton can be grown at a very small cost. The negro who now eats wheat biscuit, and candies, and talks politics, cannot be made available for competing with the laborers of Asia. There life is a stern reality, and men must work or starve; here there is no such necessity. The negro has ceased to be the laborer, he is the legislator. Supported by the Freedmen's Bureau, he is somewhat expensive; but all luxuries are, and at present he is scarcely more than a political luxury indulged in by the public, in order that we may have a good and a strong government. To secure the services of so valuable a citizen the farmer must pay high wages. But the cotton grower cannot afford to produce cotton at a higher rate than fifteen cents a pound, and if it has cost more he must be loser. The bitter experience of loss upon loss can alone change the fixed habit of planting cotton in excess. The farmer will not believe that this great monopoly has passed away forever, and that henceforth the South will grow but a small part of the world's cotton crop.

Fortunately a wise Providence has limited the cotton region of our own country, and presently we come into north Alabama and Tennessee. On the cars we learn of a wonderful wheat crop already secured in northern Georgia; wheat enough to bread the State. On each hand we see abounding fields of wheat, rye, oats and corn; the whole country waving in cereals. Never did the heart of the people ascend more gratefully to Him who is Lord of the Harvest. A wealthy gentleman from middle Tennessee stated that the seasons had been propitious beyond all precedent, and that the prospect was that corn would open at thirty cents per bushel. All the way to Virginia we saw the same evidences of the bounty of God, and we learn that throughout the North and West the prospect is that every barn, and every bosom will be filled with sheaves.

But few people are traveling.—"The times" are something awful. The country is paralyzed. It is certain that Congress will meet in July, and give the screw another turn.

THE NEWS.

The health of the City will be seen in the proceedings of the Board of Health, published in another column. There is some yellow fever, and there will probably be more.—It begins early enough in the season to reach an epidemic development, but at present the cases are few and not generally of a malignant type. There is but little danger as yet to the unacclimated. The disease, however, prevails fearfully in Mauritius, and most of the West India ports are more or less infected with it. The same general causes may produce like effects here, though in less degree. All prognostications on the subject are futile. The Faculty are not much wiser than other people as to the probabilities of its prevalence in epidemic form.

The Commanding General has, in deference to the President, extended the period for the registration of voters indefinitely.

Our Public Schools are having their usual summer vacation. The Courts have adjourned till November. With those two events, ab-sentecism reaches its maximum. All who leave at all, will be off in a few days. The pastors of some of the Churches are recruiting their wasted strength on the sea shore, and in more northern latitudes. The flocks are also greatly scattered and our City congregations are much thinned.

"The day we celebrate" has been honored "in the breach rather than in the observance." We heard of great guns, not even a fire-cracker. The latter we believe has been excluded from the country since the Portland fire. We are sorry that the boys, also for the China men. These materials of juvenile patriotism burned up a Yankee city, we shall see them no more. Had been a Southern city they would have heard no mention of the "Liberation of Independence." It must have been read somewhere, because copies are scarce, and hard to come at. "Are, and of right ought to be free," still rings in our memory like the tone of a bell whose vibrations will not die. What mad-caps of fathers were to get such notions float!

An Austrian war steamer is anchored in front of the City. She has been in Mexican waters, came up the river draped in mourning. Maximilian, of Hapsburg, certainly dead, murdered by the victors at Queretaro. He ends his dream of empire. Every body is shocked and indignant. A bloodiest picture in the book, too, perhaps, but we have seen things, and dark pictures outside Mexico.

The July Congress is a fixed fact. Met on the 3d instant, a quorum both houses. The Kentucky members are denied their seats for present. Not radical enough. It shows the meaning of reconstruction, and what will be the fate of members from all the Southern States, if they are not of the sort. The Military bill will now make so plain that even the President may understand it.

From what we can gather concerning the crops, we believe the prospect is tolerably good. The wheat crop of the West and South is very good. Corn is also said to look pretty well in many sections. Accounts are conflicting about cotton. The report has made its appearance in Texas and in Louisiana the grass is abundant every where. Freedmen, in some parts of the country, are too much absorbed in citizenship, registration, jury duty and the political canvass, to attend to the letter and spirit of their contracts. We estimate that this year from 500,000 to 1,000,000 bales of cotton, besides a great deal of corn and sugar.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

MR. EDITOR: God has been very recently, in convicting, converting, and reviving power. There were four conversions, and several accessions to the church. Both Baptist and Presbyterian friends took an active part in the meetings, many of whom were greatly blessed. We like to see all denominations worship God together; for we think it an omen for good. We think it is only the beginning of good in this part of the Lord's vineyard. The spiritual state of all the churches in this Circuit, is much better than it was. We preach to colored people whenever we get a congregation. They are religious services very well attended. A Sabbath-school was organized, the colored people last week were appointed who are taking unusual interest in the school. There are about 50 in attendance who are making considerable progress. It would be better if we were people of our own color, it our duty to establish, both schools and Sabbath-schools, the colored girls and boys, and then ourselves.

If it is a duty, let us not be ashamed to perform it. This matter that concerns one and all, because, if the negro is to live

NEW ORLEANS MARKETS.

From the N. O. Price Current.

We have again to notice an inactive market in most branches of trade, the principal exception being in Tobacco, the export demand for which continues active at full prices. The movement in our leading staple has been restricted by the limited extent of the supply offering at the ruling rates, as well as by the limits of most buyers being below the views of factors and the business mainly confined to the completion of orders which had been already partially filled. Operations in Sugar and Molasses continue to be confined to retail transactions, and in Western Produce mostly to a jobbing business at steady prices.

We notice that the Bank of America has declared a dividend of ten per cent. from the profits of the last six months.

The Sixth Quarterly Report of the Louisiana National Bank, just published indicates that its affairs have been administered with commendable prudence, fully justifying the public confidence it enjoys. The Quarterly Report of the City National, also, is decidedly favorable, and leaves no cause for surprise that it has recovered a large part of the private deposits it lost at the time of the ruin, caused by the suspension of the First National.

COTTON.—We left the market, at the time of our last report, with a comparatively active demand, since which the movement has been on a much more limited scale, and prices have barely been maintained. On Saturday, the business did not exceed 1250 bales, while prices exhibited no quotable variation. On Monday operations were checked by a protracted sale storm, as well as by discouraging advices from Liverpool, and the sales were confined to 850 bales. Tuesday the market opened with a limited demand, and very little prospect of any increased movement, but after the receipt of the Liverpool accounts factors evinced a disposition to make some concessions, which brought out buyers, and 1100 bales changed hands.

This makes an aggregate for the past three days of 2700 bales, taken partly for the North, but mostly for foreign export.

The receipts proper since Friday evening comprise 1032 bales, against 1455 during the corresponding period last week, showing an increase of 423 bales.

The receipts at this port, since the 1st of September, (exclusive of the arrivals from Mobile, Florida and Texas), are 703, 694 bales, against 665,653 bales to same date last year, and the decrease in the receipts at all the ports, up to the latest date, as compared with last year, is 149, 677 bales. In the exports from the United States to foreign countries, as compared with the same date last year, there is a decrease of 39,978 bales to Great Britain, of 15,003 to France, and an increase of 45,905 bales to other foreign ports.

MONETARY.

We have no important change to notice in the money market proper, which however, has derived additional ease from the anticipated payment of the dividends noticed elsewhere. Occasional negotiations of mortgage paper are made at from 10 to 12 per cent per annum, capitalists generally asking the outside figures and very few being willing to part with their funds at the inside.

The attack by the Mayor on the city Treasury notes, or at least on that portion of them issued since last August, and their consequent decline in the open market, has stimulated the demand for them to pay tax. The receipts of the Treasurer have consequently been quite heavy.

HYMN: UNSURPASSED.
BY AUGUSTUS L. HILLIARD.

Trembling before thine awful throne,
O Lord! in dust my sins I own,
Justice and mercy for my life
Send! Oh! smile and heal the strife.

The Saviour smiles! upon my soul
New ideas of hope tumultuous roll—
Thy voice proclaims my pardon found,
Thy blood transports wings the sound.

Earth has a joy unknown to heaven—
The new-born peace of sin forgiven!
Tears of such pure and deep delight,
Ye angels! never dimmed your sight.

Ye saw of old on chaos rise
The beautiful pillars of the skies;
Ye know where morn exulting springs,
And evening folds her drooping wings.

Bright heralds of the Eternal Will,
Abroad his errand ye fulfill;
Or throne in floods of beamy day,
Symphonious in his presence play.

Lead us the song—the heavenly plain
Is shaken with the choral strain—
And dying echoes floating far,
Draw music from each chiming star.

But I amid your choir shal shine,
And all your knowledge shall be mine;
Ye on your harps must learn to hear
A secret chord that mine will bear.

THE N. O. Christian Advocate.
CHURCH EPISCOPOACY AGAINST THE CHURCH.

Mr. Editor: My attention has been called to some ecclesiastical teaching disseminated with apparently zeal and labor, by my old friend Bishop Green, of the diocese of Mississippi. They relate to what sometimes called high episcopal ministerial authority, or "apostolic succession." These views of the church, necessarily and purposely church all churches, and excommunicate all ministers when they are not in what he calls the apostolic succession. This means that the minister must have been ordained in an unbroken chain of ordinations, ordaining, factually connected, ordaining, in a thread or line, leading from the time of the Apostles to the present time; and that at historic chain of ordination must be historically visible and continuous in all the period alluded to.

From what took place ten years ago, between the Bishop and myself, was thought by some, that it was not necessary for either of us to agitate the subject much longer, but it seems that like any other calculations, they were again, and so I suppose I will accompany him, at least, for a few steps.

gentlemen, in and around Jackson, and Vicksburg, in Mississippi, and around other places in this and some other countries. Let it be understood that the Bishop teaches these tenets in opposition to his church, and in opposition to Protestant Christianity in all Christendom.

Will my friend, Bishop Green object to this, or will anybody do it for him? He did not object to it ten years ago, when this, among other points, was pretty elaborately discussed by his friends, the Editors of the Church Herald at Vicksburg, nor will he now object to it. It may be new to those who are not familiar with the subject; but I consider the point important, and wish therefore to bring it prominently forward. These peculiar high-church notions, are the notions of a faction here and there, which have arisen in some churches, and in opposition thereto, but are not, nor never were the doctrines nor utterances of any church, nor any authorized body of ministers nor laymen of any church in Christendom. Good or bad, valuable or valueless as they may be, they have never been deemed of sufficient importance for the utterance, the teaching, or even the favorable mention or recommendation of any Christian church, so far as I have ever known. Will any body instruct me to the contrary?

With your permission, Mr. Editor, I may have something further to say on this subject: at the present, I wish merely to place the Bishop as well as myself, in our proper attitude. We are not recommending, disparaging, or discussing doctrines among churches—where religious bodies disagree, or think differently on this, that or the other subject, but an opinion of Bishop Green against the churches. MOBILE CONFERENCE.

Mr. Editor: The following correspondence will explain itself. I trust the change will meet the approbation of the members of the Conference, generally. J. HAMILTON, Mobile, July 8, 1867.

GREENSBORO, July 2, 1867.
Rev. BISHOP WIGHTMAN:

Dear Brother: We observe that the time fixed for the meeting of our Conference, is the 20th of November. We feel satisfied that a meeting at so early a date, will affect our finances, as a Conference very unfavorably, as few of our people will have received any return from their crops, by the time many of our ministers will have to leave their work; so there will be little or no money in the country.

Thus, both the salaries of the ministers, and our various collections will suffer seriously.

We request, therefore, that the time of our meeting may be deferred until the 11th of December.

Very Respectfully,
J. HAMILTON, A. H. MITCHELL,
THOS. O. SUMMERS, R. K. HARGROVE,
THOS. K. RAMSAY, C. C. CALLAWAY,
E. WADSWORTH, T. W. DORMAN.

GREENSBORO, July 2nd, 1867.

Rev. Dr. HAMILTON, and others,
Dear Brethren: Presuming that the change of time in holding the next session of the Mobile Conference, for which you ask in your communication, just received, is desired by the members of the Conference generally, and feeling the force of the considerations you present, I beg in reply to say, that the time of holding the Conference is hereby changed from Wednesday, November 20th, to Wednesday, December 11th.

Very affectionately,
W. M. WIGHTMAN.

NEW CHURCH IN ST. LOUIS.

The corner-stone of a church for the Southern methodists was laid in the city of St. Louis recently. Bishop Marvin delivered the address. The edifice is to be an ornament to the city, and to excel anything of the kind in Southern Methodism. Site, style, and dimensions are given in the Missouri Republican.

The St. John's Methodist Episcopal Church will be, when completed, the largest and finest church edifice owned by the Methodist denomination in the Valley of the Mississippi, and it will be an ornament to the city of St. Louis. The movement was inaugurated with more spirit, energy, and liberality than usually attend the inception of enterprises of like character. We learn that five or more of the subscribers contribute the sum of $5,000 each, and that the funds already raised will insure the rapid prosecution of the work to an early completion. The edifice will probably be ready for occupancy within one year from the laying of the corner-stone, and will cost, when completed, $70,000.

THE LOT.
The site of the new building is on the northwest corner of Ewing avenue and Locust street, having a front of one hundred feet on Locust street, by a depth of one hundred and thirty-four feet eight inches on Ewing avenue. It is well located, being about two feet above the grade.

THE BUILDING.
Will be one of the most substantial of its kind in the city, and in extent will very nearly cover the whole lot. The materials employed in its construction are of the most durable kind. The walls will be massive, of brick, mixed with cut stone for all exposed projections, and the building will be covered with an ornamental slate roof. The whole length of the structure, from north to south, will be 134 feet 8 inches, lap 60 feet wide; and from east to west 46 feet 5 inches wide, by 109 feet in depth; the height being 65 feet to the cresting of the roof.

The building will consist of a nave and transept, arranged to suit all the requirements of the congregation; the nave forming the church and the transept the chapel. The western end of the latter will be used for Sunday school purposes.

STYLE OF ARCHITECTURE.
The building committee, after consulting with the architect, Mr. Thomas Walsh, determined "to adopt the decorated English gothic, as applied to modern brick churches, now so successfully carried out in England by Scott, Street, and others.

The general effect of this style of architecture will be very picturesque, because of the broken outlines of the walls; the main front and that of the transept being flanked by heavy projecting buttresses. At the intersection of the church with the latter, a handsome tower will be erected, perforated by ornamental windows and surmounted by a beautiful spire, having clustered spire light and pinnacles at its base. On the north extremity of this transept will be erected a smaller tower, finished in a similar manner, but of a different design.

The main entrance on both fronts have extensive vestibules, inclosed outside by three pointed arches springing from single stone shafts, with foliated caps and molded bases. These arches, as well as those over the windows, will be illuminated by colored brick, artistically laid.

Over the main entrance on Locust street will be a large tracery window of elegant design. There will be side windows of various designs, all filled with geometrical tracery.

The transept, front on Ewing avenue is to have a large rose window filled with tracery, supported on the east side by oblong windows corresponding with those before described. There will be a niche with a handsome canopy between the latter windows.

The flank elevation south of the transept will be divided by four bays, each filled with a large tracery window, and inclosed by a pointed gable, intersecting with the main roof and forming a portion of the ground ceilings covering the chapel, while the timbers of the transept will be exposed to view, architecturally called an open roof.

The pews will be admirably arranged, giving a full view of the minister from all points. The pews in the chapel are to be so arranged as to act similar to seats in railroad cars, throwing two ranges of seats into a section, facing each other, for Sunday school purposes, making thereby a class room of every two pews.

The window sash throughout will be lead-light sash, and filled with colored and stained glass.

The Irish Church.

The Irish Church is in evil case. When you wish to judge of the merits of a cause or an institution, you may often by reading what is said for it spare yourself against it. The feebleness, the sophistry, the irrationality, the evident hopelessness of a defence, may convince you on which side the truth lies. This is eminently the case with the Irish Church. We have never heard but one argument for it, though that, we must admit, was a forcible one for practical legislators. It was said that the great body of the Irish people did not care about the question; that they knew the tithes were paid by landlords, for the most part Protestant, and did not expect that if the rectors ceased to get them the people would be any better off. They had never agitated against the Church, nor had the priests as a body, declared against it. The great agitator who led Ireland for years, and was the most eminent champion of the Catholic cause, never made the Protestant establishment a political question or remark upon it, save incidentally, and it is certain that until within the last few years, and since English Liberalism has acted upon Irish opinion, there never has been any steady agitation against what is now declared to be the chief evil of British rule in Ireland.

But though this lack of a popular demand for the removal of the establishment might very well satisfy statesmen whose only wish is to leave well alone and attend to those national desires which make themselves conspicuous and testify to the requirements of the time, there never has been any doubt in the minds of reflecting men, that the establishment cannot be justified by any moral or political argument. It is unjust and therefore it is inexpedient. The arguments which allege practical acquiescence on the part of the Irish people fall to the ground as soon as that people are roused to discontent, and that they will be so roused under the exhortations of their present political leaders seems beyond a doubt.

We then come to the question of simple right and justice. Ought this Church to be upheld? Is there any such moral benefit derived from it as should compel Great Britain to maintain it as a matter of principle against the will of the great majority of those who inhabit Ireland? The opponents of the Church have a simple case. They say and can show that it is the Church of a few hundred thousand persons, and that those who dissent from it and detest it are reckoned by millions. They can show that in some districts there is a Bishop to less number of Protestant souls than are to be found in many a London parish; that rectors in the South and West are without congregations; the flock whose shepherd is alone recognized by the State, and paid by the tithes, is so small that it often consists exclusively of his own household and dependents. Who that knows anything of Ireland is ignorant of the scandal and ridicule which these propositious ecclesiastical institutions produce? The clergyman may be a good man; he generally is, for the Irish clergy have personally the good word even of their theological opponents. But the more honest and sincere he is, the more likely is he to be brought into unpleasant relations with the people about him. He is paid to preach the Gospel, he is by law responsible for the souls of all about him, for the theory of ecclesiastical establishments knows nothing of legalized dissent. Yet no one comes to hear his sermons; no one acquiesces in his authority. Can it be otherwise than that he should become subject to a kind of official irritability, which manifests itself in antagonism to the priests, and to all those of priests followers whom he has no chance of bringing over to his views? The fault may be as such in the minority, he has to bear with failure, and with the blame of being angry at the Minister and Connaught incumbents, that it seems probable the Irish Church itself would make no resistance to a scheme by which the enormities of the present system should be done away.

The answers of the defenders of the Establishment last night did not differ from those in past times. It was asserted by the Irish Attorney-General that the arguments urged for the spoliation of the Irish Church might be used for the spoliation of individuals; that the friends of the motion could not point out how they would deal with the forfeited revenues; that the Irish Church was an integral part of the Church of England, and that seven-eighths of the tithes came out of the pockets of the Protestant landlords. It is unnecessary to waste argument on the unresisting feebleness of such pleadings as this. We would rather point to the speech of Mr. Gladstone as a proof that the settlement of this question cannot be much longer delayed. Opposition is favorable to breadth of thought and sincerity of utterance. On one side of the Speaker's chair blows a keen air, which braces the moral system; on the other are cuervation, timidity, and the desire to do nothing that can possibly be left undone. Mr. Gladstone, however, speaking out of of office, accepted a responsibility should he ever come in again, for he combatted one by one the arguments advanced in favor of the Establishment, and came to the conclusion, it would seem, that the removal of anomalies of detail would not be sufficient in a case where the institution itself is one great anomaly. This speech of Mr. Gladstone may be looked upon as a manifesto of his present principles, and we are not sorry that it indicates the near coming of a time when the British Parliament will devote itself fully and fairly to surmount the chief difficulty of Irish Government.

Yet it is not by the motions of private members that the House of Commons is to be pledged to this or that course in legislation of such importance. It, as seems now likely, the question of Parliamentary Reform be finally settled in this present year, any Government that may be in power will do well to institute enquiries as to the best means of reconciling the rights of property with the demands of justice and common sense in the matter of the Irish Church. What may be the ultimate disposition of the funds, how far the ecclesiastical system may be retained in places where, from the number of those attached to it, it appears not to be an abuse, how compensation is to be awarded, whether the State shall help all Churches or help none are questions on which a Cabinet may well ponder before it calls upon Parliament to legislate. But they do not concern us now. We know that such difficulties always appear insurmountable at first, and vanish when they are boldly approached. When the time comes, they can and will be overcome.

Musie Intended to be a Universal Gift.

We believe this may be as truly said of music as of the power of speech. There are people who cannot speak, yet no one would think of adding this fact as an argument against the universality of human language. No rule is disproved or nullified by mere exceptions. But it should be observed that the form of our statement is in itself a qualification. It is asserted that music is intended to be a universal gift, and this we firmly believe. Yet, in spite of this intention of nature, there are many persons in whom the musical perception seems to be totally wanting. They are indifferent to its charms, and so utterly incapable of appreciating its distinctions that their friends say of them, in accents of despair, "They can't tell Yankee Doodle from the Old Hundredth." Is nature to blame for this? In a great majority of cases we believe not. It is generally the result wholly of neglect and a lack of culture. Suppose that, if it were possible, a child's arm should be allowed to hang listlessly at its side till years of manhood were attained, and he should then be told to raise it; could the command be obeyed? If a person should be confined in a totally dark room till he was twenty years of age, and then brought into the light, the faculty of vision would do him very little good for a time. He could not even see "men as trees, walking." The same result would follow the neglect or disuse of any natural power or faculty, and it is simply absurd to expect the musical gift to be governed by any other law.

If a child is endowed with the marked and unusual musical talent which sometimes exists, then this talent will eventually assert itself, even under the most unfavorable circumstances. But suppose the case of a child in a family in which no attention has been given to musical culture, perhaps for several generations, what should we ordinarily expect? In the first place, it would be likely to have very little of what is popularly called the "musical ear." Then, as time progressed and no means of cultivation were afforded, there being no singing or playing in the family, no kind of musical atmosphere to develop the feeble sense, it naturally grows more and more obtuse, till in the course of years, it may indeed become impossible ever to awaken the dormant faculty to life and action again. Yet even in such case, we are not prepared to say what might not be accomplished by a sufficiently persistent course of cultivation. Among all the so-called "hopeless cases" we have ever known, scarcely any have been attacked with any sort of persevering effort to overcome the deficiency. They are usually given up at once, as if there were no more hope of developing the faculty than of restoring sight to a person who was born blind. In fact, the only case we have ever known in which real persistent perseverance was shown was finally rewarded with success. A gentleman living in a New England State, whose Christian influence is widely felt, states that through his youth he was supposed by all his friends to have no ear for music, and he did, indeed, seem to be utterly wanting in that faculty. In early manhood he became superintendent of a Mission Sunday School, and having no one to lead the singing, he resolved to fit himself for the task, regardless of the time and patience it might require to accomplish it. He began to attend a singing school, continued to attend for months, in which no sign of appreciation dawned upon his mind, and it was a year before he received any sort of an impression of what it was to have his voice accord with another. But from that point his progress was comparatively encouraging, and he soon had the satisfaction of leading the music in his mission school. We do not say that it is well for all to undertake the development of their latent musical powers. In many cases the sense may be so feeble that the time required for its cultivation might be much more wisely spent on other and brighter talents. But there is no doubt that the prevalent ideas concerning the exclusiveness of this gift have robbed many people of an enjoyment they might easily have had. We would advise parents, more especially, to bear in mind that there are some, at least, who believe that "music is intended to be a universal gift," so that they may not fail to give their children every opportunity for the development of this most desirable faculty.

ICELAND.—The scene in an Iceland church on a Sabbath is said by a traveler to be of a singular and interesting kind. The little edifice, constructed of wood and turf, is situated, perhaps, amid the rugged ruins of a stream of lava or beneath the mountains, which are covered with never-melting snows, in a spot where the wind almost sinks under the silence and desolation of surrounding nature. Here the Icelanders assemble to perform the duties of religion. A group of male and female peasants may be seen gathering about the church, waiting the arrival of their pastor, all habited in their best attire, after the manner of the country; their children with them, and the horses, which brought them from their respective homes, grazing quietly around the little assembly. The arrival of a new comer is welcomed by every one by the kiss of salutation; and the pleasures of social intercourse, so rarely enjoyed by the Icelanders, are happily connected with the occasion which summons them to the discharge of their religious duties. The priest makes his appearance among them a friend; he salutes them individually, each member of his flock, and stoops down to give his almost paternal kiss to the little ones who are to grow up under his pastoral charge. These offices of kindness performed, they all go together to the house of prayer.

WORDS.—A late visitor at Napoleon's tomb in St. Helena, writes: "I turned away from the house and tomb with deeper conviction than ever of the vanity of man as mortal." Who would not? And that death room! How the last words linger about which Napoleon uttered in it, from a crushed and bleeding heart: "General Bertrand, I shall soon be in my grave. Such is the fate of great men. So it was with the Caesars and Alexander. And I, too, am forgotten, and the Marengo conqueror and Emperor is a college theme. My exploits are tasks given to pupils, by their tutor, who sits in judgment over me. I die before my time, and my dead body, too, must return to the earth and become food for worms. Behold the destiny now at hand of him who has been called the great Napoleon! What an abyss between my great misery and the eternal reign of Christ, who is proclaimed, loved and adored, and whose kingdom is extending over all the earth!"

DEFECTIVE RELIGION.—A religion that never suffices to govern a man, will never suffice to save him; that which does not sufficiently distinguish him from a wicked world, will never distinguish him from a perishing world.
